THE AFTER-MATH

Election Day has come and gone, along with some successful and some disappointed candidates. To the great surprise of many, there was a real election day atmosphere everywhere and campaigning was rife. One could not enter the Social Science building without being approached by an interested, enthusiastic worker with a "Are you a freshman, or a junior?" and thus the day went. The halls rang with "Whom did you vote for?" and "Now listen, let me tell you about Mr. So and So." One unusual feature of the election was the intense rivalry in all classes for offices, and the candidates were indeed well matched, as the close results show. The freshman contest was a true hot-box and the eager friends of both aspirants for the longed-for honor, rushed wild-eyed here and there for voting material, and had long confabs over various turns in the tide of the day's events.

This is considered the largest number of votes ever polled in class elections and this fact is very satisfying to those who hoped to see the student body interested in school affairs. College is the place to awaken an interest in politics, since after university life, every citizen is expected to take very seriously his constitutional voting right. We hope that this election will start a movement to put class election control in the hands of the students rather than a political machine. Too often class offices are honors bestowed on a more or less grateful member of the class. These honors, (as they rightly should be, but so often are not, because of machine control) should go to students interested in further class spirit and activities.

CAMPAIGN FRIENDSHIPS

Interesting comments have been made these last few days concerning elections and friendship. In fact, someone said that you never realized how many friends you had until campaigning began. It really surpassed "Hello Week" this time for people seemed to wake up to the practical value of friends. We wonder just how long this brotherly spirit will continue. It might also be interesting to know how many supposedly good friends were lost because of political differences. The general spirit was very friendly and we hope that university students will not be so childish as to let such differences become grudges.

The student who never makes mistakes misses a lot of good chances to learn something.

ARE YOU CURIOUS?

"Curiosity killed a cat" and the modern sage adds "but satisfaction revived it again. "It is said of Lyman Abbott, eighty-three and a well-known editor, that the secret of his youth is that he has preserved the intellectual curiosity of eighteen. No man is ever really old until he has ceased to learn, or to be "up and doing, with a heart for any fate." If university students would take a more inquisitive interest in general campus affairs, they would begin to realize what a really big work Nebraska University is doing. Get acquainted with something outside of your own social group, your particular department or activity and be a real Nebraska booster—not boosting on hearsay, but actual, fact information.

PERSONALS

Dorothy Barkley, '22, who has been seriously ill with influenza, is slowly convalescing at her home in Lincoln.

Bryce Crawford, Jr., '22, spent the week-end in Omaha, with his parents, Judge and Mrs. Crawford.

Donald Van Arsdale, '21, and Earle T. Howey, '21, spent the past few days in Beatrice.

Miss Ruth Curtis, head of the department of sewing, has returned from a leave of absence. During her absence Miss Helen Comstock has acted as head of the department. Miss Comstock is now a sewing specialist in the extension service.

Professor Gass of the English department is meeting his classes today, after being absent for over a week, due to illness.

Marie Prouty, '22, is back at school again after a week's absence which was caused by the illness of her mother in Alvo.

The two junior members chosen by the Senior Advisory Board to attend meetings the rest of this year are Fae Curry and Olive Hartley.

The exhibition of the Redfield paintings shown in the Art Gallery in November here, has been shown in Kansas City and Iowa City and will be shown in Omaha in March. The School of Fine Arts is responsible for booking of this exhibit.

THE DAILY DITTY

by

Gayle Vincent Grubb

You can talk about the national politicians
And the crooked stuff they pull to get a vote,
But say! These guys will have to boost ambitions
If they want to be the high moguls of note.

And what I mean is, they don't hold a candle
To the guy who runs for office in a school;
Politics? Say, they can't begin to handle
What these amateurs are pullin' as a rule.

They drag you 'round and pat you on the back,
And call you slick and guide you to the polls,
They say—"Mark here," and do it with a knack
That beats the preacher's way of winning souls.

But when the count is over, you're the bunk,
You were nuthin' but the boob that falls for flash;
All the honey talk was nuthin' else but junk,
The make-believe has burned down to an ash.

I suppose there ain't no use for me to rave,
You've all once been the instruments of use;
But doing so, you're nuthin' but a slave,
And each new day helps make a bigger goose.
