POLITENESS REPORTER PLACES STUDENTS UNDER THE TEST
 Nearly everyone has noticed in either the Omaha or Chicago papers the "Politeness Column" which tells each day of a reporter who goes around the city trying to find the politest person. The column tells of the rebuffs and discourtesies met with as well as the courtesies. At the end of the day the one whom the reporter judges the most polite is awarded five dollars.

The "Rag" thought this would be a good way to create amusement as well as show up some of the students' faults. It has always been maintained that the University students are polite, but that there were some so self-centered to turn over a hand to help the other fellow. The idea was all right but it didn't seem to apply to the students at Nebraska. Every day for a week a reporter prowled all over the campus, in every building, anywhere students might be found. Nearly every type of article was dropped either in the snow, in the mud or in the street, and each time it was returned politely. Directions were asked from passing students in regard to finding various places on the campus. The reporter even asked advice as to where to find a good rooming house and was politely escorted down the street and almost immediately installed in a very desirable room.

What was the reporter to do? Out of all this confusion of people what one could be said to stand out as more strikingly polite than any other? Finally the plan seemed to fall to finding a discourteous person—but this worked no better. The idea which had seemed so good and promised so much amusement, had to be given up. This column even if it didn't come out as planned shows very well that this is a "pretty darn polite school," and we're all mighty glad we tried it anyhow.
