TRY NEW METHODS
EXAMS AT WISCONSIN

A new departure in examinations will be given a tryout in a class in the elements of economics at the University of Wisconsin. It will be a plus and minus. This instead of the customary essay type of examination. The plan has been tried at Columbia with success. It is expected that other schools may adopt the system.

A series of propositions numbering fifty or more will be submitted to each student. All that he will be required to do is mark a plus or minus sign after each proposition. If the statement is correct the student will mark it plus. If it is incorrect he will mark it minus. Prof. Klekhofer said Monday, "The propositions will be so worded that they will call for a large amount of thinking in regard to the subject to which they pertain. While the proposition will involve a mastery of facts, students in order to score a high mark will have to possess the ability to think concerning these facts."

MISS ANNA RICHARDSON IS GUEST AT LUNCHEON

Miss Anna Richardson, chief of Home Economics on the federal board of vocational education, Washington, D. C., was guest at a home economics faculty luncheon Tuesday noon. Miss Richardson spoke briefly of conditions as she found them in the various schools and colleges she visits. She expressed her pleasure in finding such a splendid spirit of unity and co-operation everywhere among home economics workers.

Wednesday morning Miss Richardson talked to the students in the home economics methods class on some of the problems in vocational teaching in the last three or four years.

NOVEL GRADING AT COLUMBIA U.

In grading the papers, more will be deducted from the students' average for an incorrect answer to a question than would have been credited to it had the proposition been answered correctly. The student has the alternative of passing the question up, and not marking it at all if he thinks that his answer is incorrect. This feature of the system will tend to discourage gambling on a question rather than answering it for fear of giving an incorrect answer, for of course no credit will be given in such a case.

The system has many advantages over that in use at present, chief of which is that a much greater range of the subject can be covered in an hour examination on work in which the student is thoroughly prepared. Under the present system the examination gives students training in organizing and presenting material, but on the other hand, much time is spent in writing and in framing answers that might be put to better advantage in giving definite, concrete information on the subject. More time can be devoted to thinking about the actual proposition at hand and less will be needed for presenting the answer in such form as to make it clear that the student understands it. Undoubtedly the system will be an aid to instructors in grading, for they will be able to tell what a student knows about the subject without having to wade through a mess of irrelevant facts. "The system has been used very successfully in Columbia university. As used there, each statement, marked correctly gives credit, each marked incorrectly counts as a penalty, the penalty being greater than the credit for correctly marked statement. In this way the student is discouraged from guessing Statements which the students omit are counted neither for nor against them, the final grade in the examination being determined by the number of correctly answered statements."

This will be the first trial of such a system at Wisconsin and the result will be watched with interest not only by the department of economics, but by the entire university.
