A feature at the inter-collegiate debate at the Temple tomorrow night is the open forum discussion which immediately follows the presentation and rebuttal. The feature is not a new one but is one which appeals to the audience and which creates interest in the debate.

Each person in the audience is permitted to question the speakers of each side, constructively criticize their arguments, and present new phases of the question neglected by the members of the team. Incidentally the members of the teams benefit from these discussions not only by gathering new viewpoints on their question but by securing experience in rapid-fire answering of questions.

Nebraska students have heard considerable discussion this winter of the importance of keeping in touch with current international events. The visit of the foreign students emphasized the international outlook. A magazine, presenting the views of competent authorities on the international aspects of America's political, economic, and financial problems, comes highly recommended to university students of the country.

"Foreign Affairs," the new review, is ably written and edited, and comes endorsed by such outstanding public men as John W. Davis, Elihu Root, David F. Houston, and George W. Wickersham. In addition to its leading articles, which are based impartially on trustworthy information, the quarterly magazine provides a bibliography of recent books in the international field, an index of reference material for students and writers, and a list of the treaties and trade agreements for the increasing number of American business men who find their work affected by conditions abroad.

Contributors to the first two numbers of "Foreign Affairs" include: General Tasker H. Bliss, Dr. Charles E. Elliot, Joseph Caillaux, Andre Tardieu, Premier Eduard Benes, Charles H. Haskins, Josef Redlich, and other students of international affairs of equal importance.

"Foreign Affairs" seems to be a magazine worth following in order to keep posted on the important international events of the day. Our duty of keeping posted will be made much easier with the help of it and similar references.

The so-called "intellectual dishonesty" of American debating has been at the receiving end of attacks for several years. Critics have contended the American type with that of the English, pointing out that in England the debaters speak for their personal convictions, while in America expediency often compels a debater who believes in one side of a question to speak on the opposite side.

This criticism arises from a misconception of what American debating strives to accomplish. Most American debating—and debating as developed here at Nebraska—is the gathering, classifying and sifting of evidence. Persuasion and analogy have little place. The intercollegiate team that stakes all on "windjamm-ing" and emotional appeal will soon find its anatomical balloon punctured and itself tumbling to a landing place. Neither is American debating the expression of the personal convictions of the debaters. The personal opinion of a twenty-year-old undergraduate on the League of Nations is unimportant. What he personally thinks about the League is not of general interest. But the facts of the case are; and the collection and presentation of these facts is American debating.

Thus the debater tells the audience

what he thinks, but what authority on the question think; not what he thinks should have happened or what might have happened, but what records show actually did happen. In his debating he is impersonal. A declaration that such debating is in fact intellectually dishonest is a display of ignorance of the real purpose and aim of American debating.

There are points for and against both the English and the American systems but the cry of "intellectual dishonesty" raised against American debaters should not influence judgment of the relative merits of the two systems.
