Pharmacy Week with special attention to Pharmacy night, holds the center of the stage of student activities. Celebration of the third annual Pharmacy Night in Pharmacy Hall tonight is not merely a social gathering. It does more than to acquaint the people of the University community with the accomplishments of this college. It serves to mark a steady growth in numbers and usefulness which has characterized the Pharmacy college since its recognition by the state legislature eight years ago.

A larger graduating class than ever before will receive degrees this spring. Graduates of the college are receiving distinction in their post-graduate work. Members of the faculty of the college have won recognition all over the country for their research work. The leadership of the college has always been recognized as progressive and sane. The whole University, then, unites in congratulating the Pharmacy College on its birthday and in wishing for it continued prosperity and advancement.

It is with regret that the announcement comes that the next University Player production, "The Taming of the Shrew" to be played next week, will close the 1922-23 season.

The Players present one Shakespearean play each season. They have selected a well-known and well-liked comedy for their last play and are assured of student support in their final appearance of this school year.

The present season has been eminently successful. The plays have been carefully selected, coached and played with the usual fine quality of the Players productions, and well received by the audiences. Students have seemed to enjoy the productions more each year and the demand for a continuance of the University Players is greater now than ever before.

In the University there are men and women who make grades of A and B in practically all their subjects who at the same time have time to participate in many of the school activities and make for themselves names as loyal members of the University. Some of them even make part of their living expenses on the side. In this same University there are those who cannot keep up with their work, who never were known to be in a college activity and who would be aghast at the idea of having time to make a part of the living.

The difference between these two types is in their methods of organization. These people who manage to get things done do so because they utilize their time to its best advantage instead of wasting a few minutes here and there with the idea that a few minutes won't make any difference anyway. And it is in that way of thinking that the time waster type of University student is bred.

Instead of making a list of the things which must be done daily, appointing a certain time at which to do them, and doing them at that time, the time-waster thinks, "I'll do it over the week-end," and then when the week-end comes puts it off until the first of the week and so on ad infinitum until he checks up short at the beginning of quizzes and wonders why it is he fears he can't get through the course. A regular system outlined, and held to, will do more to save time and mental energy than any other one thing. The very idea that a certain amount of work must be done in order to make way for another piece, will spur the average student on to finish on schedule time. In this way all the work laid out to be done can be accomplished.

It is the few minutes wasted here and there that kill the day for you. It is the fifteen minutes you waste trying to decide whether to go to convocation or Brick's that makes the hour much too short to get anything done. It is the half-hour bridge game at lunch which puts you back on the hill at 2 o'clock instead of, and the hour wasted between five and six which if utilized would do much to put you up in your work. In a word it is drifting aimlessness and careless organization which makes the day seem too short to get all you have to do done. If you could organize what you have to do, make a regular schedule and hold to it, allowing time for play as well as study, and make your head save your feet as far as your hill meetings and activities are concerned—if you can do all these things, you will find your college activities and studies dovetail very nicely together. You will discover that a twenty-four hour day is ample time to get all done you have laid out to do and will even leave some time in which to sleep.

Now that the end of school is approaching and things begin to pile up, try this little system; stop being a time waster.—University Daily Kansan.
