

CONCRETE SEWER PIPE TESTED BY UNIVERSITY

Professor Evinger Secures Sections Such as Used by City of Lincoln.

Through the co-operation of Prof. M. I. Evinger, of the department of civil engineering, and Dean A. Mars-ton of the Iowa State College of Engineering, the University was able to obtain for testing purposes eight sections of reinforced concrete pipe, selected from those manufactured for the reconstruction of the Lincoln out-fall sewer, which failed during the spring months of this year.

Three sections of the pipe, one month old, have been tested in the testing laboratory of the applied mechanics department. They, as the rest, were lock-joint pipe with an inside diameter of fifty-one inches, a laying length of four feet, and a thickness of shell of five inches.

"Three other sections will be tested in the laboratory after the pipe has cured for a longer period of time. Two other sections are now being tested under actual trench conditions. It is believed that as a result of the tests in progress some very practical correlations will be developed between the design and the laboratory tests of the pipe on one hand, and the actual conditions to be met with in practice on the other hand," said Professor Evinger.

These pipe are among the largest that have been subjected to laboratory test and are serving as a practical experience to the students.

Professors Evinger and Duff are now carrying on tests and special investigations of a clay product, commercially known as Segment Blocks, now commonly used in Lincoln in the construction of the outfall sewer, but which failed in the spring rains last year. It is believed that these tests will prove of especial value to municipal engineers, and for that reason Dean Ferguson hopes that the results may be published in bulletin form for general distribution among those interested.

A. D. Hollingshead, a Nebraska man and a graduate of Wesleyan university has been selected by the Teachers college of New York City, as one of four men to go to Springfield, Mass., to work on the financial section of a school survey being conducted there, it was announced last Thursday.

Work on the tomb of Tutenkhamun is expected to be expedited in consequence of the arrival of a number of experts from Cairo. Howard Carter, head of the expedition, was slightly indisposed yesterday and the tomb was not opened for work.
