Rumors Unfounded
Say Harvard Profs

Professors at Harvard University have recently been greatly aroused over numerous rumors to the effect that their institution is lacking in moral and religious thought. Harvard is not dominated by a Y. M. C. A. organization or one of its type and the college does not have a compulsory chapel. Investigation on the part of eastern authorities finds that upon these facts the rumors seem to be founded.

Prof. E. Caldwell Moore, chairman of the board of preachers at Harvard, and professor of Christian morals, is much amused at the report that Christian associations have offered prayers for "Godless Harvard." That the turmoil during the chapel services at Yale is due to the fact that chapel is compulsory, is the belief of Dr. Moore. "Compulsory chapel at Harvard would be as distasteful to officers of the college as to the students," states the professor.

"Here, every man who attends chapel does it because he wants to," states the Harvard Crimson following an interview with various school authorities. "The emphasis here is on individual thinking and rational ideas of religion. We do not want standardization of ideas and ideals. Thirteen colleges may have got down on their knees at Indianapolis recently and prayed for us, but prayers and advice are not likely to make our chapel better or worse."
