NORTHWESTERN'S STAND.

The Associated Press report of the mass meeting held last Sunday at Northwestern University, when an earnest attempt was made to show the world that the school was not a pacifist institution, contains one cryptic sentence which is of more importance than are the accounts of the speeches made by President Walter Dill Scott and the other gentlemen present. The sentence reads: "David Williams, a leader in the extremist group at the institution, was dismissed from the University yesterday."

Why was the student dismissed? The implication is quite obvious. He was dismissed because he was an extreme pacifist and because he and thirty-seven other students had signed a pledge never to take up arms. President Scott would probably tell us that he was dismissed so that the good name of the school might not be tainted by association with the idea of pacifism.

It would seem that University presidents would sometime learn that this sort of thing is dangerous. Northwestern University has done more than dismiss a student who was a pacifist,—it has deliberately branded itself as an institution where free thought is not tolerated. It has made it plain that any thought which is not agreeable to the president, the board of trustees and those gentlemen who may contribute or who have contributed generously to the endowment fund, is pernicious and should be rooted out.

Pacifism may or may not be a crime, depending upon your point of view. The question is not whether or not the student and the group of students in question were right or wrong. No one is going to ask President Scott, or the University for that matter, to endorse pacifism. But there will be a number of gentlemen who will want to know just why it is that a University should dismiss a student because the student thinks for himself.

President Scott is going to find that he has not protected the good name of the school as much as it would seem. What he has done is to open the armour of the whole American University system at a very vulnerable spot.

Those people who have read Upton Sinclair's "Goose Step" will begin to wonder if there may not be some truth in that vivid, but one-sided and prejudiced work. The liberal and radical press will be quick to see the real significance in the action of the University and we may expect that for some time to come these publications will be taking frequent and gleeful pot-shots at Mr. Scott and his colleagues.

There was a time when President Scott might have been a hero, and perhaps rightfully so. But that time is passed. There are no German guns thundering in France now and "Over There" has ceased to be a popular song, even with the Democratic party. This is 1924; not 1917. President Scott is seven years behind the times.

THE HOME STRETCH.
Eight more weeks of school. Spring vacation has come and gone and the University must settle down to the wind-up of the year's affairs.
Those who got off to a poor start the first half of the semester will do well to buckle down and make up the lost ground, for vacation will soon be upon us.
