HUMBLE GRADUATES.

When Dr. Thompson declared in his annual address delivered in Chapel yesterday that the college graduate of today is more humble, more modest and altogether finer in his attitude toward the world than were the graduates of forty or fifty years ago, he paid the highest possible compliment to educated men.

In other years, college graduates too often thought of themselves as possessing all the knowledge of the world. A certain pride in their academic training would not allow them to admit that after all there might be something else to learn. Even today that pedagogic attitude is discernible in a graduate now and then.

For the most part, however, college graduates nowadays are impressed with how little they do know. That in itself is proof that the educational system of today is better than the one of past years, for to admit that you know little is to know much.

College is held in much less awe now than it was a generation ago. It could not help but be, because so many more thousands of students now attend institutions of higher learning than did half a century back. With the increased enrollment has grown up a different feeling between instructors and students, suggested by Dr. Thompson in his address.

The feeling that students have few rights, that they are immature, that they should be impressed with the high majesty of professors is gone, and now the worth-while instructor recognizes the rights of the student and treats him with more respect. Being regarded as a man among men has taken from the student that rough edge of sophomore intolerance. No longer regarded, with grandiloquence of thought, as a scholar, he has become a thinking man, and thinking men are known for their modesty and their humility.—The Ohio State Lantern.
