justice, Dean Pound said in part, The root of the trouble is in pioneer institutions trying to meet the omplex needs of metropolitan life of today. The methods of administration sprang from the pioneers of ere unsatisfactory today.

The frist act of every pioneer community was the foundation of a system of public schools. Great things are due to the pioneer education. But they were as reckless here as elsewhere. Their recklessness is forcing us to rebuild where they erred, and the rebuilding is often painful. There had been too much crowding of the humanities from the schools at a time when the world is crying for such culture Too much attention has been paid to "bread and butter" subjects.

"More and more we must learn administration of this country along every line and more particularly in law and government. We must guide men in times and places where a course of action cannot be weighed. Already we have begun such work in traffic signals and similar activities.

*To administration, the pioneer had always been adverse. He wanted only the minimum of control, or receiving of orders. Now we must learn to administer. Poor legislation is one of the greatest handicaps to effective administration. And poor legistlation is the outbreak of the pioneer spirit trying in its restless virility to solve our problems.

"But after all I believe, that these qualities of the pioneer hold a great deal for us. It is not impossible that this restlessness of the pioneer may keep us alive in a mechanical age. We seem to be entering an era of business and industrial pioneering. The better qualities of the pioneer coming out may make it possible to solve the problem facing us. In closing his address Dean Pound said, "The pioneer had no dogmas, no precepts. He knew it was the spirit which gave life while absolute precepts and dogmas stifle and kill."
