The trav-now is a fence built around it by to mark it save a fence. The traveler on the highway a few rods west of the grave might pass it by unmindful of its existence if he were not acquainted with the country. And yet connected with this grave there is a story, a story of love and devotion, and a reminder for of the early days when the gold rush was on, when men risked every danger and hardship in hopes of finding a fortune in California.

It is one of the many graves that mark the course of the old Oregon trail, a mute testimony of the price paid by the immigrants who were on their way to seek for the hidden treasure in the west.

When news of the discovery of gold arrived in 1849, Mr. Haile, of Lafayette county, Missouri, like many others took his wife and what possessions could be loaded onto a prairie schooner and started for the Pland, where a fortune was to be made in a fortnight, according to board.

Lonely Trail

The trail followed the Little Blue river to a point south of Hastings and then turned off to the northwest to strike the Platte river and of old Fort Kearney, an outpost of civilization in hostile Indian territory and a haven for the weary Immigrants. Midway from where the trail leaves the Little Blue to the military post and Fort Kearney there was a well, owned by a man who saw the opportunity of profiting from the thirsty travelers. A few days before Mr. Haile and his wife arrived at the well Indiana had massacred the owner and pol-soned the water. Not knowing this they stopped to camp for the night, watered the oxen and drank freely of the water themselves. During the night both became seriously iil and the next day they tried to reach the Platte river where pure water could be obtained. After travelling all day they had gone only some six or seven miles and were still two long miles from their goal when night overtook them. They pitched camp in the sand hills, the tall cottonwoods that line the Platte visible in the distance, hoping that on the morrow they would reach the river and could soon turn the oxen's head to the west.
