All The World's a Stage

'The Four Feathers' Screened With Great Risk, Depicts African Desert

Sound Epic of Screen Combines Best Features of Both 'Beau Geste' and 'Chang;' Story Well Portrayed by Capable Cast.

Not so long ago, Lincoln theater goers were amazed at a great motion picture production of the silent screen, the gallant, spirited "Beau Geste." Following that spectacle they marveled at the vital, fast moving "Chang." Now from out of the Paramount fold comes a sound production "The Four Feathers" heralded to be a combination of the two aforementioned with the additional entertaining features made possible by the talking screen.

A. E. Mason's splendid novel has been brought to the screen at last and those characters he describes so vividly are given life and depicted by a capable cast including Fay Wray, Richard Arlen, Clive Brook, William Powell, and Noah Beery. The picture itself was filmed in the still dark regions of the African jungle and on the scorching, blistering sands of the great Soudan. Cameramen, directors, performers and all risked danger and death that this production might be made possible.

As the story progresses one sees hundreds of wild beasts in a mad rush to escape a jungle forest fire; thousands of desert savages—Kiplings Fuzzy Wuzzies—attacking a lonely British fort, which must be defended at all cost if the young hero is to regain his lost love and honor; romance which is granted to only a few. One sees a loving spirited girl suddenly stunned by the disgrace of her lover; lost honor symbolized by four tiny white feathers. But to say more would be foretelling the plot. This sound epic as other critics have expressed it will open at the Lincoln theater Monday. Am I wrong? See for yourself.

See you later
PLAY BOY.

"The Four Feathers," heralded as the sound epic of the year by motion picture critics everywhere, and opening at the Lincoln theater tomorrow presents a cast of outstanding, well known screen performers—Fay Wray, William Powell, Clive Brook, Richard Arlen, and Noah Beery.
