year by the permission granted for the completion of certain nine week classes by extension. The nine weeks session is well established. Both students and faculty members realize that subject matter courses and graduate work cannot be carried on satisfactorily when limited to as short a period as the six weeks session.

"Due to the necessity of budget reduction caused by the cutting of the university budget, it may be necessary to eliminate some of the short term courses in 1932," Mr. Moritz continued, discussing plans for next year. "Under such a change the one, two and four week courses would probably be given every other year."
