One of the features of the Dramatic club's play contest Wednesday night will be the one act play "Kaddish," written by W. Zolley Lerner. "Kaddish," the author explained, is a Jewish word meaning mourning for the dead.

As the play opens the mother and daughter are preparing their home for the celebration of Yontov, a Jewish feast day. The father of the family, who has been detained from the evening meal, is saying "Kaddish" for the son of a close friend when he enters. The son is going to marry a Gentile.

The father's own son returns for a visit and a gay celebration is planned. But when the family learns that the young lady who is with him and is to be his bride the situation changes to one of sadness for she is also a Gentile. "Kaddish" is once more said, this time for one of their own family, since he has chosen to leave them forever, rather than give up his bride.

PLAYERS OPEN WITH 'CAMILLE' MARCH 6

New Play Is Story of Life And Loves of Paris Courtesan.

With the opening night of "Camille," next play of the University Players, only a week from today, the cast is completing the polishing of the production. Given March 6, "Camille" will be the fifth play of the year.

"Camille" is the story of the life and loves of a Paris courtesan in the time of Dumas, whose son wrote the play. The younger Dumas was supposedly inspired with grief, because of the death of his own "Camille" and this grief took the form of a novel, later made into a play.

His lady, Alphonsine Pleiss, masking under the name of Marie Duplessis died while he travelled in Spain. Returning to Paris, he found her grave in Montmartre cemetery and covered it with camellias, and then mixing tears with ink capitalized on his experience by writing the famous play.

Alexander Woolcott, known for his "Shouts and Murmurs" on sundry subjects, saw Camille for the first time at Yale last fall. "I went to 'Camille' with an open mind," he commented, "It is still open."

In speaking of how "Camille" has been played in America during the nineteenth century, Woolcott rages, "The Marguerite Gautier of Dumas' imagination was a wasted waxen girl who died when she was twenty. But it has been so often depicted in America by robust actresses in full bloom, that I suppose most people grew to think she had died of gluttony."

Costumes will be one of the chief attractions of this newest play. Settings will be designed by Dwight Kirsch and Dick Page, and executed by members of the dramatic department.
