ECONOMY FORCES REGENTS REDUCE NUMBER AWARDS

Thirty-Three Assistantships For Grad Students Eliminated.

In keeping with the regents' plan for economy to be carried out in the university this year is the abolition of tuition scholarships and reduction of student assistantships' salaries.

Decreasing revenue made it necessary for the regents to eliminate the 100 tuition scholarships that have been offered for several years, to eliminate the law scholarships that have been given to about 20 percent of the student body of the law college.

This year there will be about 100 of these assistantships as compared with the 133 last year. While it was recognized that these scholarships were of great benefit to needy and aspiring students, it did not seem desirable to continue this policy.

HERE is a sobering thought for freshmen: Many college graduates are without work.

Many a young man or woman graduated from college has found it impossible to turn his or her technical training to capital advantage. What, then, is a sane and healthful attitude for a freshman to assume toward his college experience?

Our own Dean W. W. Burr, speaking from the faculty's point of view, has adequately answered the question: "We must teach our students, first, how to live; and then, second, how to make a living."

Changed to the student's point of view, the answer, then, is to learn first how to live by taking courses that are broad, cultural; and then learn how to make a living by taking courses that are specialized and technical.

If a student's great aim in college is to increase his understanding and appreciation of people and things so that his life may be fuller, richer, and more meaningful, then he can scarcely fail of his objective. If a good job comes along at the end of his four years, just so much the better. But if a student goes to college four years solely to secure technical training for an important position, ignores the social and cultural possibilities, and in the end fails to attain that position, then college training is disappointing indeed.

HULBERT USES GRID METHODS IN CAPTURE

Fleetness of foot and ability to make a flying tackle enabled Corwin Hulbert, former university football player, to retrieve vital parts of his automobile Thursday evening.

Mercury Carries Story Written by Wimberley

For the second time in the past three or four months Doctor L. C. Wimberley, editor of the Prairie Schooner, has a story in the American Mercury. The title is "White Man's Town" and it appears in the September issue. The former story was called "Censored."

FRESHMAN PERSPECTIVE. TOMORROW is Freshman Day.

Little groups of freshmen accompanied by a faculty member scurry to and fro about the campus to the beef or dairy barns, to the engineering laboratories, to the athletic field, and perhaps—if they are very bold boys—to the Home Economics building.

As these new students pay their first visits to the various buildings around the campus many new and fascinating thoughts are at work in their minds. They are actually entering the state university. They are perhaps awed by its magnitude, its mystery, its profundity. They marvel at the great fund of information that must lie behind the walls of these buildings. They thrill to think that in four years some of that information will have become a part of their own knowledge. And doubtless many of them are looking even beyond the college to that good job, or position, that is to come as a consequence of these four years training.

Many an upperclassman of graduate can recall these same impressions on the first day of his first visit to Ag college.

But many a graduate who, as a freshman can recall, looking forward to a good job or position after college is today without a job. At least many are without jobs that can in any way be attributed to college training or that in any way require college training.
