Purchasing Department Store in West Stadium Buys Three-Quarters Million Dollars University Supplies Anually

Thirteen thousand people gather on the roof of one of Lincoln's department stores each year to witness countless Cornhusker victories. The store, which occupies the room beneath the entire west stand, is a branch of the university's purchasing department, which buys as much as three-quarters of a million dollars of materials annually.

Entering the west stand from 10th st., one finds himself in a large, well-equipped office, which houses the accounting department through which orders from the university, ag college, medical school, substations and experimental farms are received and checked.

The storeroom represents the result of an act of the Board of Regents in 1921, which centralized the physical plant of the university, and provided for controlled buying for the rapidly growing school. These stores furnish materials for all branches of the university, and save money by timely purchases.

One of the most interesting of the plants is the printing establishment, which occupies almost one-fourth of the floor space. All university bulletins, catalogues, and official publications are printed here on standardized paper that is purchased in ten ton lots. Adjoining is the stenographic department, which offers mimeographing and multigraphing services to the colleges.

The largest plant is the garage, which services the trucks and automobiles of the operating plant. Included in this section are machine, electrical, and plumbing shops. Radio broadcasting is a service offered by the electrical department, and is used extensively by the ag college and the extension division. The amplifying system in the Coliseum and the public address systems used in the stadium and for outdoor campus activities are provided by this department.

Miniature College Exists Within Walls of San Quentin Penitentiary

From the Daily Californian: University of San Quentin! Behind strong high walls of San Quentin penitentiary, a little college, originated in 1917 largely thru the efforts of Prof. Leon J. Richardson, director of the University Extension division, offers prisoners "higher" education.

Much of the success of this prison school is due to the generosity of the university, Dr. H. A. Shuder, director of education, stated yesterday. In addition to carrying on their regular studies at the penitentiary, one thousand men are enrolled in extension courses, he declared, and all of the inmates benefit by lectures given by university professors.

"I know lots of university instructors who wouldn't last here fifteen minutes," said Dr. Shuder as he sat in his glass-partitioned office. "There are many students in Berkeley who are just 'serving time' in the classroom. Over here it's different." He pointed to a group of solemn-faced convicts as they filed by the office, headed for their classes. "These boys are only allowed five hours of classes a week and they demand that something concrete be given them."

The teaching staff is composed of inmates, all wearing the drab prison gray uniforms. They are proud holders of state instructor certificates and represent a portion of the 500 former college men who are confined in the penitentiary. Some of them have been university professors and instructors.

Asia, she was passing thru exactly the same stages that England endured in the period of the Wars of the Roses when an attempt was made to add France to her territory so as to maintain a stronghold on the European continent. Japan's greatest difficulty is the presence of two powerful neighbors on both sides, China and Russia.

With lucid simplicity Dr. T. Z. Koo, celebrated Chinese lecturer and leader, described his personal impressions of the Manchurian conflict between China and Japan in his apartment at the Driskill hotel Wednesday afternoon. Wearing a white native coat of peculiar weave, black trousers, and comfortable slippers on diminutive feet, Dr. Koo analyzed Oriental and American developments in a clear cut way with pronounced enthusiasm and interest.

Dr. Koo, to Speak Here, Describes Impression of Manchurian Conflict

Dr. Koo visited the two fronts in northern China while the Japanese were attempting to push through the Chinese lines. Even in the relatively small scale of the combats as compared with those in other wars, Dr. Koo was impressed with the horrors of modern warfare, the desolation of the cities, the bombing raids, the turn of events that allowed grass to grow in the middle of the streets of the besieged cities. He maintains that in a fully equipped war the non-combatants would be completely over-run.

Looking further into the war situation, he witnessed the inequality in equipment of the two armies, with the Japanese fully prepared, in possession of the most modern mechanical devices to combat opponents, and the Chinese woefully lacking in even the most needed of equipment. However, the Chinese soldiers as individuals were much more efficient and ingenious than those of the Japanese army who functioned better in situations where the commanding officers were present. The mortality rate in the battles was high, especially for the Chinese who lost 9,000 soldiers in a fourteen day battle at Haifengkon Pass as contrasted with 5,000 losses in the Japanese army. The Chinese were victorious despite their heavy losses.

A strange quirk of the battles was that at 11 and 4 o'clock the Japanese bombarded the enemy and were quiet for the rest of the day. Dr. Koo states that except at those hours he was safer behind the lines doing relief and Y. M. C. A. work than he would have been in cities such as Peiping which were subjected to frequent air raids from the Japanese.

DR. KOO TO TALK AT LUNCHEON MEETING
