Divided We Suffer.

THROUGHOUT the past two weeks the student pulse column has been besieged with letters decrying the disorganized condition of unaffiliated students on the campus and the comparatively little interest shown in barb activities and organizations. Others have bemoaned the coldness of this pseudo-friendly school while still others have condemned the unattractive housing facilities which are the lot of many students.

Dissatisfaction with certain phases of university life has thus been expressed through criticisms of three separate matters, yet back of these three and back of other inevitable complaints which are aimed at the university constantly from within stands a condition which so long as it shall continue to exist, will be a thorn in the side of any attempt at a unification of the student body. That condition is the lack of finances and facilities to center on and within the campus all university activities and suitable dormitories or other housing for all students.

The University of Nebraska is unfortunate in its location. State fathers saw not the great development of both university and city which was to come. Hemmed in today by the business section of the city on the south, the shipping or commercial district on the west, and the railroad tracks on the north, only to the east has the university room to expand and to do this there is no money at present. It can easily be seen that the university's location is not one conducive to the development of cultural or intellectual pursuits which flourish best in comparative peace and quiet. Furthermore, what little space it does have at present is overcrowded so that all in all, the university is off to a poor start in whatever internal organization attempts. What are the results?

With the exception of fraternity and sorority students and the very few who live in Raymond hall, the student body (and this means far more than half of the more than 6,000 registered here) is scattered all over the city of Lincoln. They live singly, by twos, by threes, or more in all types of living conditions. Some have excellent homes or rooms, others have rooms that are not the best but at least acceptable. But many have downright unattractive and undesirable living quarters.

The ideal remedy for this scattered and decentralized student population, of course, would be an adequate group of dormitories on the campus. A uniform and high enough standard of living would thus be assured every student not a member of a fraternity or sorority, and the presence of this great number of students on the campus could not but favorably influence cultivation of friendships and strong internal student organization.

As things now stand, it is small wonder that these students, separated from contacts of any description with other students, feel no especial love for the university. Their natural social tendencies to mingle with their fellow man are stifled by their isolation. Oftentimes those who seek roommates can secure none and fail to take advantage of whatever facilities the university may provide for aiding them in this difficulty.

Freshmen, particularly, bearing the eternal stigma of "greenness," are often prevented by an inferiority complex that is not entirely of their own making from entering activities, social or otherwise, that have been designed to aid their very plight. It is hard to break in on an organization or an activity or a group of students in which one has not a single acquaintance or friend.

This feeling tends to keep the lone freshman alone during his first year in school. It is then easy although unpleasant to remain thus while their college career is continued. The feeling of isolation and separation grows upon them. Some give up their college training as a result of this; others go on to graduate but leave school with not one trace of anything resembling love for their alma mater and harbor in their hearts no sentiment which will point their footsteps homeward toward Nebraska in years to come.

This is a sorry state of affairs. Students as individuals have no common ground or place at which to meet. Organizations are likewise afflicted and the oft-criticized uselessness of many of our professional, departmental, and honorary groups seems traceable at least in part to this condition.

The student union, as has been pointed out, was one answer, at least in part, but this project is still lost somewhere in administrative jugglery. Meanwhile the unfortunate situation continues.

What is to be the answer? There can be none until the state of Nebraska realizes the important position and functions of the university and the valuable service it renders the state in countless channels. We stand now a loosely-knit body within the university dependent upon the support of an even more loosely-knit band of alumni and friends throughout the state for our existence.

When we can bring home to the citizens of this state the importance of adequately equipping this educational institution to enable it to execute its every duty to the state and a society, when we are able as a result to have our student population concentrated within a comparatively small area and its activities confined to the campus, then the university can expect and realize an appreciable degree of loyalty and love on the part of its students; then we can expect something in the way of united action, co-operation, and mutual friendship from and among the student body, and the university will reap the valuable dividends which creation of definite ties between students and between students and alma mater inevitably assure.

A ROUND AND BOUT

With
Sarah Louise Meyer

We are constantly being disillusioned. This time it was about the great Shawn, and the one responsible is no other than Maximilian Schnitter. He was there in the first row of the balcony, having gone "to keep peace in the family."

"You call that hopping around like toads, dancing? That's not art, it's a disgrace. I saw those boys before the performance. They look as if they had come from the Bowery; you'd be afraid to meet them on a dark night."

My only possible reply, of course, was in acquiescence....

From an edition of the Nebraska State Journal of August 1, 1901, that was knocking around the Botany library, come such journalistic gems as these: "The youth who has to scratch for his living never sows many wild oats." "A Bright Home Makes a Merry Heart." Joy Travels With Sapollo.

And from an Omaha Bee of Dec. 12, 1900, along with chapters 13, 14 and 15 of Thomas Hardy's "Mayor of Casterbridge," is this bit of coquetry: "Do you subscribe to the old saying? "All the world loves a lover?" "Only partially," answered Miss Cayenne; "only to the extent that pity is akin to love."

Which is suggestive of sources of material for the "good clean" fun of the Awgwan.

We have always been interested in the interests of men. Somebody or other Brice lists them as: 1. Occupational, 2. domestic, 3. religious, 4. recreational, 5. political.

And the "Rotarian" figures that men spend their money—in order, and all—thusly: Food, rent, savings; clothing; automobile; household furnishings and supplies; medical care; recreation, education, tobacco, soft drinks, and other forms of self destruction, personal adornment, and fuel.
