Time on Your Hands.

There is a particular species of efficiency expert that harps on the marvelous results obtained from a time schedule. He insists that every hour of the day must be allotted to studying and work, sleeping and eating, play and rest; that life can't go on unless it is planned to almost the last minute. Such addicts are few, but some of their less ardent disciples may be found on the university campus whose practice of the doctrine may be more sound, but who could improve their system by taking to heart a few suggestions.

Clearly and simply, there can be too much of the good thing of organization of time, the first evil appearing when the systematizer becomes the victim of his own system and fears to break down the routine. Routine has the unpleasant propensity of making dullards even as the lack of it produces fly-by-nights. So to check the foe, one must do things on the spur of the moment—don't get out of the habit of spontaneity and initiative.

One worry of the rigid adherent to a schedule is the possibility that someone or something may upset his plans for a whole day, or even for a whole week. The person who is greatly distressed when unexpected contingencies arise, even when they displace plans of lesser quality, is plotting his life too closely. He's offering too much to the god of order, and not taking enough from the wells of human experience.

Some of these would-be brain-trusters spend the greatest portion of their time planning what they are going to do. Their notebooks and walls are cluttered with charts and graphs on what should be done and when they plan to do it. It is absolutely true that they are cheating themselves out of valuable time in which they might be accomplishing their plans.

The most afflicted is the one who finds it necessary to plan intensively because he has not had the courage or the foresight to say "no" to some of the demands made upon his time. His energies are consequently spread out so thin over this multitude of tasks he has inadvertently accumulated, that nothing is done thoroughly, the worthwhile along with the unworthy. The systematizer must first know what it is he wants most to regulate, exclude other interests, and then time can be arranged so as to take care of all effectively. It's a good thing to know what you are doing and where you are going, but life loses its zest when there is no corner to peek around into the future. If the dullards and the scatterbrains would take only a judicious dose of efficiency, their living would improve accordingly. Temperance is great in all things.

STUDENT PULSE

Brief, concise contributions pertinent to matters of student life and the university are welcomed by this department, under the usual restrictions of sound newspaper practice, which excludes all libelous matter and personal attacks. Letters must be signed, but names will be withheld from publication if so desired.

An Hour For Convocations.

Recently at 11 o'clock an interesting and educational open forum was conducted for university students and faculty members, namely a debate on the New Deal by two well known speakers. We have already had two exceptionally good convocations this year, and several worthwhile gatherings were held last year.

However, all students who desire are not privileged to attend these convocations due to classes they must attend at the 11 o'clock period on Tuesday or Thursday mornings, when most of these convocations are held. True, some university instructors dismiss their classes to allow student attendance, but it is not practical or possible to let a class out every time there is a convocation. So much work in a course must be completed within the semester, and so class dismissal every time is not possible.

Now in order to enable students and faculty members to attend these worthwhile meetings, why can not the university officials, in making schedules for the next and ensuing semesters, leave the 11 o'clock period on Tuesday and Thursday vacant, so all who are interested may go to convocation without the necessity of cutting a class?

With a vacant period reserved for convocations, many more could be planned, and perhaps more intellectual curiosity and knowledge of world affairs by students (and perhaps faculty members too) could thus be broadened. Many colleges do set aside such time for student gatherings, and goodness knows, if out-of-town speakers cannot always be obtained, Lincoln and the university itself could supply enough to have frequent and highly worthwhile convocations that would provide that something which is not obtainable in the classroom or text-book.

New schedules for next semester are now being made. While all students do not have classes at the usual convocation hour, enough of us do who would like to attend, and are forced to a choice of cutting a class or missing the convocation, both undesirable for the earnest student. Officials can help the university student in his quest for knowledge by allowing a free period for convocations, and in arranging for more of them!

POOL GIVES LECTURE AT HIGH SCHOOL DEC. 2

Professor Talks on Subject Of Trees for Girl Reserves.

"Trees can conquer the elements, a thing which man has not yet learned to do," stated Dr. R. J. Pool, professor of botany, at the open Girl Reserve meeting, Dec. 2, at Lincoln high.

Slides illustrate talk. Dr. Pool illustrated his talk by means of colored slides, showing pictures of the Douglas Fir, Sitka spruce, flowering dogwood, quaking Aspen, juniper, cottonwood, Italian stone pine, cactus, sequoia, and Rin oak.

The Douglas fir is six or eight feet in diameter and about 300 feet in height. The Sitka spruce and flowering dogwood are natives of southeastern United States, while the quaking aspen gets its name from its continual quivering of its branches. Giant Sequoia is the oldest living thing and range from 25 to 300 feet in height, said Dr. Pool.

Trees Conserve Water Supply. In showing the slides he attempted to bring out how different the landscape would look without the trees. "Trees trim up the landscape and give it finish besides conserving our water supply."
