YOUTHS CROSS OCEAN ON CONDEMNED BOAT

Dan, Jerry Williams Work as Coal Trimmers on Ride Over Atlantic.

"It's Europe or bust," said Dan and Jerry Williams last spring. They got to Europe, but only by working as coal trimmers on a condemned passenger ship that was being taken to England to be scrapped. For ten days before they landed their jobs on the ship, they tramped New York docks looking for work. The jobs found, they spent three weeks helping recondition the ship before sailing.

Dan and Jerry related their story jointly at a meeting Wednesday night of the Y.M.C.A. Dan told of hitch-hiking to New York and of their experiences crossing the Atlantic.

On the ocean the old boat ran into severe storms during its thirteen day passage. At one time it was 200 miles off its course. The Williams brothers received slightly more than ten pounds, English money, for their services on shipboard.

Jerry Williams took up the account with their arrival in Europe. He described the Youth Hostels, camps scattered throughout the Continent to give tourists lodgings at night. The hostels charge 25 cents a night. The low rate makes travel inexpensive and tends to encourage international friendship, according to Williams.

Both men attended several Student Christian Conferences in Europe and Jerry had the opportunity of visiting his home school in Swanson, England.

The complete trip took six months.

With an affinity bordering on magic, three of the nation's eminent republicans, followed by the campus press, were attracted unerringly to the elephant room of the Nebraskan museum yesterday afternoon. Once in the great room, housing the most mammoth of mammals, the republicans admired Dr. Barbour's collection, admitted to be one of the best, without ever connecting these masterpieces of taxidermy and fossil preservation with that mythical beast who will labor from now until the first week in November to pull the Landon-Knox chariot into the white house.
