We, The Pupils By Boyd Innes

The following news should interest people interested in politics: As everyone knows The Literary Digest has been carrying on a straw vote on the coming presidential election. This straw vote shows Landon receiving an overwhelming majority. However, the "Digest" gives how these same straw voters voted in 1932. If you take all those that voted Republican and all those voting Democratic, you will find to your amazement that these straw voters would have elected Hoover in '32. That is the problem which confuses us, because the "Digest" poll for that year showed Roosevelt sent out ballots to a preponderance of Republican voters or it was merely another one of those heavenly miracles. In either case, it is a deliberate attempt to bolster up Landon and at the same time they can save their face if Roosevelt is re-elected by pointing out what we just disclosed. By the way, if any Democratic papers copy this, please give us credit for the discovery.

We learned that we have on our campus a recent feminized convert to Bacchus, that is, smoking tobacco. If the report is reliable, a charming Theta enjoys a few puffs on a very virile pipe while studying.

We had always heard that pipe smoke was conducive to gentle meditation and delicate dreaming; but if it stimulates those more practical mental processes necessary to the pursuit of higher education, that is something else again.

The way Art Shaw plays his theme song "Nightmare" causes us to realize how thin the veneer of civilization really is. It makes us feel the same way one of our pagan ancestors should have felt, if an early version of the Ziegfeld follies had been shipwrecked on his particular island. Give us that music and an impetuous Ina Rae Hutton to dance with and you can have your arts and sciences. Just thinking up things such as that causes us to feel the unfairness of being allowed to be only one person during a life time.

We were inadvertently looking through our history book and found the following interesting information about Oxford scholars during the Thirteenth century: There were to be no dogs or falcons, no dice or chess; scholars were not to frequent taverns, engage in trade, mix with actors,

University Political Guns Muster Forces

Organization of a university branch of both major political parties got under way on the campus this week. Officers were elected and committees appointed in order that the corresponding platforms of both Landon and Roosevelt may be forwarded as much as possible in the next month. Vigorous enthusiasm has been shown by both groups.

It is the aim of both organizations to bring as many national figures to the campus as possible. Charles P. Taft, brain trust to the Kansas nominee, addressed the initial meeting of the young republicans. The opposite camp promises an address by Senator Hugo Black of Alabama during the coming week.

or attend theatrical performances. The authorities even found it necessary to curb such boyish delights as throwing of stones in chapel and dancing or jumping in the dining hall. Women were not allowed, as a rule, within the college gate. If it was impossible to find a man to wash clothes, a laundress might be employed, but she must be old and of unprepossessing appearance! The student arose at five in the morning and after various study and lecture finally ate a dinner at ten. He ate dinner at this time because breakfast was not common until the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Then it said that he would eat his supper at five. After this they could tell honest jokes and go to their amusements.

Since there were no amusements provided by the college, they sought their own amusement. This took the form of roaming the streets in large gangs under a captain, singing, throwing stones, breaking doors and heads indiscriminately. They gambled and frequented the taverns. There were many pitched battles between town and gown, one of which led to the public humiliation of Oxford annually. It appears that the boys were quite exuberant, to say the least.

EASTERNERS ENJOY NEBRASKAN ACCENT

French Faculty Members Announce Approval of Middle-west.

Miss Grace Shelly of Swarthmore, Penn., teacher in the French department and studying for her M. A. degree, finds much enjoyment in our "western accent."

Miss Shelly, herself, speaks with a less noticeable accent than most easterners since, as she explains, the pure eastern accent is found in the New England states. Coming from Pennsylvania, she finds the westerner speaking with more decisiveness in intonation and vowel pronunciation. Expressing the belief that she will probably very soon learn the "western accent," Miss Shelly speaks much more smoothly, now than Nebraskans. Mr. Herman Litwin of New York City, who is teaching French and Spanish in the department and also studying for his M. A. degree, reflects his New York accent by the occasional omission of his "r's."

Both Miss Shelly and Mr. Litwin expressed the opinion that they feel it a very great privilege to have the opportunity of studying in the middle west.
