EFFICIENCY IN READING

can I make of this idea or this knowledge?" or "How does this concern me personally?" Even in psychology, some students regard parts of the course as merely something printed in a book, without realizing that what they have learned applies to themselves and should henceforth be part of themselves. When this happens to my students, I know that I have done a poor bit of teaching.

In some courses the laboratory work gives you the direct experience necessary, but in most reading you have to supply the link which ties ideas to your own personal activity. Often the suggested problems at the ends of chapters add you to apply the principles and make them part of your experience.

Make It Interesting.
Many students complain that they have difficulty in concentrating while they are reading or listening to lectures. I ask them if they have trouble in concentrating on movies or on entertaining magazines. Invariably, they say, "No." Reduced to their essence, their answers indicate that they concentrate readily on the things in which they are interested and on those which they like. (These latter amount to the same thing, since they like the things in which they are interested. We psychologists sum this up by saying, "Attention follows interest." The problem of concentrating is then one of finding something which is interesting. I am certain that every instructor, every course and every book has something of interest to offer, if you will put forth a little effort in looking for it. Once you have found something interesting, it will lead to something else of interest and the problem of concentration solves itself. An exception to this occurs when something other than your studies, especially an unfinished task or an unsolved problem, is so compelling as to call attention away from the reading or academic activity in which you should be engaged. Under these circumstances, you must do what you can about the other important activity first.

In these two articles I have been very dogmatic, platitudinous and unscholarly. Yet from my observations during the past ten years, I know that any one can improve his efficiency in reading and studying by following the rules I have given. In fact, I am considering reforming myself by applying several of them.
