Charm School Attends Downtown Style Show

Members of Charm school attended a spring style show during their regular meeting hour last night at Magee's. One coed from each house on the campus modeled the new decrees of fashion. In charge of the style parade was Virginia Griswold, leader of the Charm school, and Virginia Fleetwood, Coed Counselor board sponsor.

has to unload his opinions on those that do get trimmed. An average haircut takes about 20 to 25 minutes and that is just barely enough time in which to give a brief resume of the cutter's opinion on the world at large. Consequently, the larynx has to function at full speed.

It is when a customer subjects to a shave that the true barber rises to great heights of conversability. Laying two or three hot towels on the customer's face, the barber is then free to lecture on anything he wishes to, with no back talk. If he is careful, however, he will leave his customer's ears uncovered so he can be heard. Or if it is someone the barber does not like, he can inflict further mental torture by covering one ear so that whatever doctrines he propounds will not be able to go in one ear and out the other.

Beauty operators, too, from what we gather, are usually not the strong, silent type.

A. B. Barbers.

Now you may say to all of this: True, but what of it? Well, just this. Why should we go on suffering mental tortures every time we go into a tonsorial parlor? Why not develop a class of barbers who could discuss learnedly such topics as sports, politics, philosophy, sociology, etc.?

A barber shop that had triple threat workmen who could clip, cut and chat intelligently and advertised them as such, could really build up a large clientele.

At first glance this seems like the ideal opening for a college graduate. Even at second glance it looks like a good opening for those who have accumulated multitudinous facts for what purpose they know not. Certainly the art of conversation would be a great asset to a barber and a college graduate could pick up the tricks of combing, clipping, cutting and using a straight edge to shave pretty quick and become a first rate barber.

But if college graduates refuse to use such an opportunity to distribute the fruits of higher learning among the hoi-polloi, then barber colleges should institute conversational courses and courses in philosophy, economics, journalism, history, military science, psychology, etc.

Foolish? Why it has unlimited possibilities. A barber shop with workmen who specialized in various subjects could feature one the first day and the next barber the next day. They could set aside certain days for certain subjects. Hang a sign in their windows saying:

Jake, the Barber with an A. B. Today's Special
A Lecture on International Relations free with every shave and hair cut.

And on days preceding notable athletic events, a special on the history and famous characters in the sport involved could be featured.

In fact, if the thing grows, barbers would develop specialties and be in demand from coast to coast. Each Saturday night, for example, a guest barber from some distant tonsorial parlor could be featured, with added attractions.

Perfect Solution.

Not only is this a perfect solution for the agony which customers must undergo when they hear various subjects mishandled, but it is a perfect solution for dull business in the barber trade. Barbers complain of low prices and sluggish activity. Showmanship is what they need. It would positively drag in the crowds.
