reptiles in Nebraska which have been falsely associated with such outlaws as the coral snake and the water moccasin, two very poisonous species which infest the southeastern states, says Dr. Hudson. One of these is the common water snake. This species is thickbodied and vicious, and in general appearance looks something like the cottonmouth moccasin, but is really non-poisonous. The milk snake, because of fits coloring, is likewise confused with the coral snake. Another non-poisonous reptile con-sidered dangerous here in Nebraska is the hog-nosed snake, which will hiss ad spread out its neck upon the approach of an individual. with the result that the person is lick to conclude that it is a dangerous reptile. The name given it the state is spreading viper. There is still another poisonous species which inhabits this part of the country, but is quite harmless because of its small size. That is the blackheaded snake, never more than ten inches in length, which, like earthworms upon which it feeds, lives in the ground most of Copperhead Seen. Not until making the trip this summer did Dr. Hudson find evidence which showed beyond doubt that the copperhead of the south had come as far north as Nebraska. While driving along the road several weeks ago near Rulo. he found a copperhead that had been run over and killed on the highway. Residents in that community reported that they existed in large numbers' around the countryside. The copperhead, says Dr. Hudson is not so deadly as the and has shorter fangs. It seldow has been known to reach a length of more than 3 feet in these parts

Dr. Hudson argues that only the poisonous variety should be exterminated. There are many, he says, who think that bullsnakes and others should be killed because they kill birds. But other birds, such as the marsh hawk, probably kill as many if not more birds than do the snakes, yet these individuals
