wrong that the allies had for some 15 years steadfastly refused to fight. It is here that Hitler has the allies in a tight spot.

For on the other hand, as Hitler pointed out, England and France have admitted that their real aim is to stop Hitler, to rid the world of the German regime. This makes their guaranty to protect Poland merely a pretext for fighting the German people. In short, the aim of the allies is to determine for the German people what type of leaders they should have, this being, to the German view, essentially an immoral standpoint.

Hitler was noticeably uncertain about the Russian invasion of Poland, and tho he praised the German government for its ability to reach an agreement with the Soviet, he said very obviously that "Russland ist Russisch, and Deutschland deutsch," that each country would remain as it was, that neither had desires on the other, that both peoples were satisfied with their governments.

Stalin cashing in.

I think that Hitler realized that Stalin is cashing in on the German war, and at any rate, Stalin holds all the aces in the European card game. Stalin saw his opportunity and knew, even as England and France were trying to reach an agreement with the Soviet early in August, that Russia could make demands, and was in the position to get those demands fulfilled. For Russia was and remains sort of an European balance of power, assuming the erstwhile position of England.

Hitler had to wage an 18 day war, had to risk his domestic popularity by letting thousands of Germans be killed in the Polish campaign, had to risk his international popularity by plunging the world into a new war, and received about the same amount of territory as the Russians. Russia had only to march her army into a Poland that had already been subdued.

Danzig German forever.

Hitler was definitely defiant, pledging that Danzig would never again be separated from the German reich, that the greater Germany would never again surrender as she did in 1918.

I could not help but wonder, as Hitler was orating so ably, what his partner, Duce was thinking, what the neutral advent of Russia into the war. Mussolini must consider the English propositions very carefully.

I could not help but wonder what Chamberlain was thinking, what the English people were thinking, when Hitler said pointedly that the allies might go on fighting, but for what. Germany, of course, has not as yet declared war on the allies, and has committed only retaliatory actions on the western front.

I wondered what American listeners thought when they asked themselves the question Hitler put to the allies, "for what," for certainly in Hitler's eyes the American interests are infinitely less than the allies'.

I could not help but wonder what German mothers and wives thought, how they felt toward

Hitler, toward Danzig as they awaited the news from the front, as they watched their men march toward the battlefields; and even as the Danzig crowds sung festively "Deutschland Uber Alles," they too must have been wondering about the German war aims, and they too must be asking themselves, in vain of course, "for what."
