

Designing coeds invited to enter campus originals

Coeds with a flair for designing originals in clothes, may now make their talent "pay." The medium is Campus Originals Guild, which scouts for a select group of manufacturers interested in seeing collegiate designs.

The guild is going to select and pay 50 college women to act as their representatives at the coeds' respective schools. All representatives will be seniors (class of '41). A new senior will be chosen each year; she will keep the guild informed as to "what's going on" in regard to fashion trends and fads on her campus.

She will encourage all girls with a taste for designing sweaters, dresses, or just plain gadgets, to cash in on their designs to the guild. If they have enough style and practicability, the guild will accept them, use them, and pay for them.

In addition, the designer's name and college will be attached to the merchandise and sold in stores thruout the country. A letter to the guild is sufficient to enroll.

Waring, Songstress view 'bonaphone'

Reider and his 'rib music' take New Yorkers by storm

Because eight years ago he heard the mellow musical clink of prehistoric rhinoceros bones, Henry Reider, chief preparator of the Nebraska museum, has just returned from a trip to New York where he appeared on Major Bowes' amateur program, "Strange as It Seems," and played for Fred Waring and Donna Dae, who appear with him above.

For strange as it seems, the musical tones of the bones when he held them in his hand gave Mr. Reider the idea for a novel instrument, the bonaphone, constructed like a xylophone, with bones for bars. The ribs used have an exact pitch and a peculiar tonal quality because of the metal deposits which have accumulated in them for thousands of years.

The bonaphone completed after eight years of work, won Mr. Reider nationwide prominence when he played it over local radio stations. Robert Hicks, of "Strange as It Seems," invited him to play the new instrument over his nationwide "oddities" hookup, and Mr. Reider went to New York.

"Rib music" fascinates. The vertebrae paleontologist so fascinated New York by his "rib music" that he was asked to play on Major Bowes' amateur program, and with 1,200 other amateurs went through the endless auditions until he was named as one of the nine to appear last Thursday night on the amateur program.

Completely captivated by the glamor of the big city Reider was "bothered to death by interviewers and the thousands of questions people asked him."

However many the trials of being famous, Mr. Reider thinks it had its compensations, for he was allowed to do some work in the American museum of Natural History in New York, and one afternoon he played his instrument in a private concert for Dr. Roy Chapman Andrews and members of the museum staff.

While in New York, he also dropped into the Fred Waring headquarters and played the bonaphone for Mr. Waring and Donna Dae, formerly of Lincoln.

Nice people. People were awfully nice to him, modest and unassuming. Mr. Reider thought, and he met a great many celebrities. "Major Bowes is a wonderful man and has a great sense of humor," says Mr. Reider. "And another thing, he takes just as much care of the little men as the big ones. I wasn't scared a bit when I was on the air. I didn't even think about anything else but just what I was doing."

Very much impressed by the huge studios of the Columbia Broadcasting system was Mr. Reider, who said they seemed wonderful to him.

He met Metropolitan opera star Richard Crooks when he was a guest on the Firestone program, and also "a lot of actresses but I can't remember any of their names."

All in all, though it was nice to be in New York and see everything, Mr. Reider is pretty glad to be back to Morrill hall and its familiar fossils, for, says Mr. Reider, "People in the east are in an awful rush, and if you don't keep up with them, they step on you."
