Headlines—

(Continued from page 1.) sources here, may lie in the fact that the proposal was so much better than the British expected that they were hesitant about over-expressing themselves.

Congressional comment has for the most part been guarded, with the law-makers evidencing a desire to withhold definite approval or disapproval until they know more about it. However, late Wednesday, isolationists in the capitol were beginning to marshal their forces in opposition.

Berlin had no comment beyond the observation that the United States might not be able to collect at the close of the war, the supposition being that there would be no Britain to which to look for repayment.

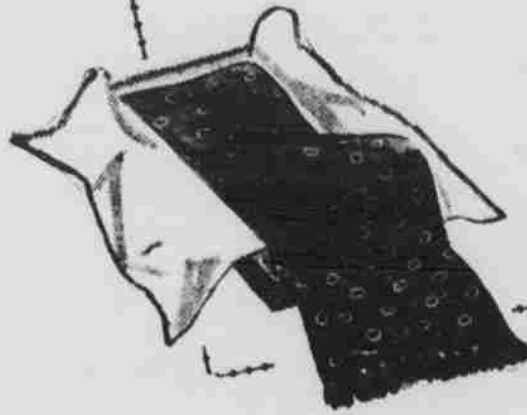

The plan definitely strikes a new note in Anglo-American relations, and from here seems highly workable as well, particularly when considered from the point of view of an ever-growing number of Americans that the best immediate defense of the United States is the success of Great Britain in defending herself. In addition, the type of material produced for Britain under the plan would be the type of material the United States would need for itself. Also, the continuation of British orders in this country will be a tremendous asset to national defense here because of the additional creation of productive facilities thus made possible.
