have fought in the war and will fight in the peace."

In the midst of the general discussion which arose from this speech, The Netherlands moved that an amendment to the first amendment be adopted. The amendment offered was that Section 3 read "... decisions shall be taken only with a two-thirds majority vote of the Council, including vote of all five permanent members listed and three non-permanent members." In defending this amendment, The Netherlands delegate stated that the balance of power would be opposed to decision of the Security Council if four permanent members were not in favor and the other country was for it, but the power would rest with the minority and smaller countries would have no power.

Hold Recess.

After a brief recess, during which time pressure groups and delegates canvassed the session, The Netherlands asked to withdraw their amendment. Great Britain, who had seconded the motion for amendment refused to withdraw her second.

Before the vote on the amendment was taken, China moved that the question be referred to a reference committee for further consideration. After that action was clarified and a vote taken on the motion for tabling and the motion was defeated, the moderator called for a vote on the amendment to the original amendment.

Indecision on the part of several countries and the efforts at persuasion by the axis representatives and pressure groups in addition to lobbying and caucus-taking during the voting resulted in a majority vote against the amendment.

With the loss of the amendment to the amendment, the question of the original proposal was still before the peace conference. When the moderator called for a vote on the original amendment, even more activity was evident on the floor. China was undecided and passed her vote twice, and this amendment was also lost by a vote of 24-31.

Threatens Withdrawal.

As soon as the result of this vote was announced, a delegate from Russia threatened withdrawal of Russia, Great Britain, France and the United States if the amendment was not reconsidered. At that point, The Netherlands representative voiced a plea for cooperation in the peace conference.

Confusion resulted from the point of order raised by Canada. Since Russia was in the minority in voting on the amendment, it was out of order for her to propose reconsideration. A delegate from Bolivia then pleaded for a peace based on mutual faith and not political expediency, but was stopped by the moderator because there was no motion before the house at that time.

China's next move was for a reconsideration of the motion for referring the question to a special committee, but since she had not cast her vote, the motion was out of order. After a country finally moved for a reference committee reconsideration of the proposal, the motion was accepted by the conference.

Adjourn Session.

With the adjournment of the first plenary session of the peace conference, the question was submitted to a reference committee, composed of two delegates each from Great Britain, U. S. A. and Russia, and one delegate from China. According to the planning committee, the small nations will also be asked to attend the committee meeting.

The committee will reach a decision on the question of voting power on the Security Council and will report their decision to the second plenary session Friday night. The vote taken at that time will be final and there can be no reconsideration according to laws of parliamentary procedure.

Concluding her talk, Mrs. Rohde quoted two speeches made by Woodrow Wilson during the last war in which he said, "We must see to it that pain and peril never come upon the world again."

Boucher Lauds Session.

Heralded by Chancellor C. S. Boucher as "the most laudable educational enterprise I have ever known to be staged on any campus," as he spoke before the audience of 2,000, including students, faculty members, legislators and Lincoln residents, the chancellor added that the library resources have been used more in the past three months more than at any time in the past three years.

Miss McKinsey told the session of comments made by Congressman A. L. Miller in Washington will be several other amendments, all promising "hot debate and plenty of excitement," according to Barbara Stahl, chairman of the planning committee. She stated that there will be no more reading of reports and debate from the floor will furnish the surprises.

frankly why they were not reluctant to leave and have described the situation in the terms just mentioned.

Financial Conditions.

"While the immediate occasion of our appearance before you has to do with financial conditions, we believe that you should be aware of a further feeling within the faculty which we know is of great importance in the minds of our better men and our younger men when they consider offers from other institutions. This, in brief, is a general question respecting the future of the university itself. It may not be known to all of you that the university enjoys a higher reputation outside the state than it appears to enjoy within the state. We know that young men have been led to come to us partly because of the university's high reputation and have been greatly surprised to discover the present atmosphere of gloom. We have no solution for this situation, but we know that it exists. It is of the greatest concern to departmental and college administrators who see the necessity of recruiting staffs on a large scale in the immediate future."

and read a telegram from Joseph C. Grew, acting Secretary of State in the State Department in Washington. The telegram was sent to university officials and reads: "It is of the greatest importance that the young people of America take an active part in the discussion of the problems of the post-war period and the international organization which will so fundamentally affect their lives. It is gratifying to learn of the constructive effort which the students of the University of Nebraska are making to this end."
