Mr. and Mrs. A. H. Easterbrook of Arcadia have announced the engagement and approaching marriage of their daughter, Doris, to Art Biendorff, son of Mr. and Mrs. A. B. Biendorff of Lincoln. The ceremony will take place Dec. 21 at eight o'clock in the Plymouth Congregational church in Lincoln. Both Miss Easterbrook and Mr. Biendorff are students at the university. Miss Easterbrook is a member of Alpha Xi Delta, Alpha Epsilon Rho, Student Council, Tassels, and has served as a cheerleader for three years. A member of Kappa Sigma, Publicity Board, Kosmet Klub, and Corn Cobs, Mr. Biendorff is completing his first year as Yell-King of the university.

Day of 'He-Man' Past; Sly Coeds Take Over

BY ELLIE SWANSON.

As much as I hate to say another word on the male and female situation, I couldn't help noticing the past few months that the young blades are slowly succumbing to women's superior will . . . they are becoming "hen-pecked."

It was inevitable, of course, but one thing we women pride ourselves on is that . . . we're so subtle! For example, what could be more subtle than when a comely young coed says to her date, "Waldo, after all, I've let you go out with me twice, I should think you would at least be grateful enough to buy me a steak instead of a hamburger."

Changed Attitude.

There was a time when Waldo would have answered (hoarsely), "Listen, worm, do you want to eat or don't you?" He would thereby have ordered her a peanut butter sandwich and said "ah, shut up." But then there's the meek submissive Waldo of today. "Couldn't I get you something else to break the monotony of an icky dry old sirloin?"

Then we find Waldo answering a telephone call after just settling down to study for a chemistry exam. "Waldo, I'm in the Crib and I just can't seem to find my cigarettes. I know you wouldn't mind running over with a pack." He speaks . . . "but . . ." She speaks . . . with emphasis. "Do you want to go out with me tonight?"

Slinks in Crib.

Not quite making the five minute limit she had set, he slinks into the Crib sideways and eventually spots her as the center of attraction in a booth with five larger men. (Larger than himself, that is.) Finally noticing Waldo, a trifle inconspicuous on his knees, she breaks herself away momentarily. "Joe loaned me his," she announces, exhaling a cloud in his face. "See you tonight, say at ten?"

"Do you think men are getting discouraged?" I overheard a casual conversation the other day in which two of the more brutal girls were beginning to wonder how long their luck would hold out. "There're too stupid to give up dating us," the other answered, making a face at a persistent gentleman who refused to flirt back at her.

Subtle Tricks.

"My conscience doesn't bother me at all . . . it doesn't even slightly object," returned the first, realizing with a pang of hurt that she didn't have a date for three weeks from last Thursday. At this point I broke in. "I don't know what your attitude is, but I think men are almost human." "She may be right," one admitted thoughtfully to the other. "I guess I'll let my date dance with me tonight without making him do three backward flips with no hands first."

Feeling that I had done my deed for the day, I left, resolving to reform slightly myself. After all, women's angles are endless and men have so much to learn. (My only encouragement to any man who might have stumbled on to this by accident is that we women may have a mass meeting soon, and I will put up a motion to declare men as near equals to ourselves.)

Blood Donations Handled by VA

It was erroneously reported in the Thursday edition of The Daily Nebraskan that the American Legion was guaranteeing blood donors $25 for donations. An agency of the Veterans Administration will handle the payment.

However, American Legion authorities have assured the public that this will have no effect on the re-imbusement and urge every possible student to register at the Lincoln Hotel Legion office for donations.

All Badminton Players!

All university women are urged to attend a badminton meeting next Tuesday at 7:00 p. m. in Grant memorial. This meeting is being sponsored by the women's badminton club of the physical education department.

Personally Speaking

BY NORM LEGER.

University life, apart from academic work, seems to be spent by many students, as you've observed or discovered from your own activity, in the pursuit of what is called a "good time," either in the social whirl or in the extracurriculars. Admittedly, social life is enjoyable, and activities are fun, and, as is our opinion, offer valuable training to those who participate in them, although there are many critics, students as well as professors, who would contest the merit of our opinion.

However, we do feel, and we sincerely hope we can find a unified opinion here, that university life consisting only of academic work and outside fun lacks an element that can give stability and depth to the life of the students. That element is religious training, and every student, whatever his creed may be, has an obligation to himself to learn more about his religion and to strengthen or clarify his beliefs.

Today is the beginning of Religion In Life Week which will offer to every student valuable assistance in helping him to meet his personal obligations. Mary Esther Dunkin, executive chairman of Religion in Life Week, has readily consented to tell you, through this column, what there is for you in the week's activities.

"First, there are a few things I feel that need to be stressed so that no student will have a misconception of what Religion in Life Week is about. Its program is inter-racial and inter-faith which means that every student enrolled in the university should be interested and participate in some phase of the week's activities. The guest speakers include a Jewish rabbi, three Catholic priests, and a number of protestant ministers. The purpose of the week is not to attempt to reach a common ground of belief, but rather to reach a common ground of co-operation and understanding of the various faiths.

"The theme of the week is 'The Faith That Makes a Difference,' and the speakers and discussions will not be concerned with the study of religion itself, but will take up the phases of religion that pertain to everyday living.

"The seminars will be concerned with such topics as 'World Relatedness,' 'Relieving Racial Tensions,' 'Problems of Faith,' 'Preparation for Family Life,' 'Inter-Faith Understanding,' and 'Fundamentals of Christian Faith.' Don't let the word 'seminars' frighten you away; in most part, they will be discussion groups in which everyone may participate which should prove to be highly interesting.

"One of the outstanding features of the week will be the Skeptics Hour which is scheduled for Tuesday night. Here the students will have the chance to voice any controversial question he may have that needs answering. The guest speakers of the week will be the ones to answer the questions, unanswerable as some of them probably will be.

"The one event that no one should miss is tonight's convocation in the coliseum. Dr. T. Z. Koo whom you already know about, will give the address. I'm sure that if the students attend tonight's opening convocation they will want to attend more of the meetings throughout the week.

"Many students will be glad to know that they may arrange for personal conferences with the Miss Betty Rose, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. R. C. Rose of Taylor will be married Dec. 8 to Thomas M. Bodie, son of Mr. and Mrs. Fred E. Bodie of Lincoln. Miss Rose, a former student of the university, was graduated from the Sophy Teeters school of nursing at Lincoln General hospital. Mr. Bodie, a graduate of the university, was a member of Acacia. He served six years with the infantry and was discharged as a captain.

guest speakers to discuss personal problems or to clarify conflicting issues. There will be a both in the Union where students may sign up for these personal conferences at any hour of the day.

"Each day's program will be printed in the Daily Nebraskan so that the people who do not get a program at tonight's convocation may have a schedule of each day's events.

"I hope that everyone on campus will attend as many meetings as possible. I often feel that college students, because of their changing ideas, are confused about their religious beliefs, their faith becomes vague, and then tends to remain that way. Religion in Life Week can help the students to adjust his faith to the change of philosophy brought about by his college work."

Social Workers Schedule Dinner Wednesday Night

The American Association of Social Workers will sponsor a dinner, followed by a meeting, Wednesday at 6 p. m., for all students who are interested.

The speaker, Mrs. Marcella Allen, secretary of the Reclamation association, will discuss the "Development of the Missouri Valley." Reservations for the dinner should be made with Mrs. Oliver Warrick, 228 So. 10th St., by Nov. 11.
