Granted that the University of Nebraska team is not one of the top squads in the nation this fall, but the Cornhuskers are still a step or two ahead of the gridiron aggregations at Iowa State and Kansas State. Yet at these two schools, where the football teams have been able to win one and no games respectively this season, the spirit has been remarkable.

The Ames school has completed special arrangements this week to send recorded school yells along with the Cyclone team when the squad faces the University of Oklahoma at Norman on Saturday.

It was a horrible 63-0 shellacking at the hands of the Sooners last year that moved Iowa State students to adopt an all-out pep program. The road this year has not been smooth for the Cyclones but school spirit has never slackened.

Kansas State is not enjoying a successful season. Coach Sam Francis' pupils are mired in gridiron depths Phi Delt pin. It's about time, you brought on by more than twenty consecutive conference defeats, yet Wildcat enthusiasm persists. Husker players and team followers who made the trip to Manhattan last week can verify the tales of overwhelming student support accorded the Kansas State team.

And the story is duplicated in other schools around the Big Six. Naturally, students backing winning teams do not need spurring or coaxing to assist in generating school spirit. Everyone supports a winner, but when fortunes turn and the winner loses, the student backers are put to a test.

Regardless of the outcome of Saturday's game against Missouri at Columbia, the Husker team will be deserving of united support when it returns to prepare for a trio of home games that will wind up the schedule. Being on the road four consecutive weeks is not an easy assignment for any team, especially when opponents recall the days of Nebraska's gridiron majesty and make special preparations to gain revenge for past defeats.

The fact that the Scarlet eleven's next Lincoln appearance will be Homecoming should do much to boost student support. With this initial inspiration, students ought to have no difficulty producing the type of enthusiasm which any Nebraska team deserves.

Czechoslovakian Exchange Student Enjoys UN Life

BY SAM WARREN.

Paul Dzavik of Brataslava, Czechoslovakia, the university's first exchange student, came to the United States in a whirl of last-minute acceptances, hurried good-byes, and general confusion, to find the University of Nebraska surprisingly more pleasant than he had possibly expected!

"We have always known that you had great freedom in Amer-ica," he said in a special inter-view, "but I did not expect it to be like this. You can say whatever you like. In Czechoslovakia, we have no such freedom."

A graduate of the "commercial college" in Brataslava which cor-responds to regular university here, Paul Dzavik was struck with another contrast between the two countries, namely the relations between university professors and students. European professors, who often hold positions in government ministries, leave the room the minute they finish their lectures. There is no association on the same level with students. "It is all very formal." Dzavik, incidentally, approves the American way.

When the International Institute of Education, which help to arrange exchanges of students between countries, announced that four students from Slovakia would be accepted in American universities, Dzavik applied. A senior then, he was employed parttime in a nationalized industry, Slovak Woodworks, in an effort to earn school expenses.

Hearing nothing from his first application, he entered a second one in October of 1946, when applications were re-opened. waited again and still heard nothing. I forgot about it, and nothing. I forgot about it, and never believed that I could go," he recalled. But suddenly on July 1947 he was notified by a letter from one G. W. Rosenlof that he had been accepted to study at the University of Nebraska, in the United States. "I'd never heard of Nebraska, but I didn't really care where I would study as long as it was in America.' Necessary arrangements fol-lowed in rapid succession. Tak-ing but a one-day leave of his family, he rushed to the capital

The biggest surprise of whole journey did not take place on the continent, on the waters, or in New York where he landed Sept. 22, but rather right here in Lincoln, when Mr. Rosenlof himhim at the train. "He did every-thing for me that night, and was with me all the next day. He was like a mother to me!" he exclaimed, not yet willing to believe that a university official would take such interest in a mere student.

When asked if entering university late had been a hardship to him in anyway, Dzavik smiled, "I've had no difficulty—except with my English!" Doing his Doing his graduate work in economics, he is a little uncertain as to just which phase of economics he wishes to specialize in after getting his degree. "I'll only be here a year. One year is a short time!"
