Actor's Lab Interprets Three Past Broadway Successes

BY FRANK JACOBS

Interesting one-act interpretations of three past Broadway successes were staged by the Actor's Lab in the Temple Studio Theatre Thursday evening.

Abridgements of Eugene O'Neill's "Anna Christie," Ferenc Molnar's "Liliom" and Lillian Hellman's "The Children's Hour" were effectively presented before a sparse but appreciative audience.

Opening the program was Eugene O'Neill's saga of the sea, "Anna Christie." The play tells the story of an old Swedish sea captain's prostitute daughter, reared in poverty and holding a bitter grudge against mankind.

Betty Lair was a very convincing Anna Christie. As the moody, affected, uneducated harlot, she clearly overshadowed any defects in the production. She was ably supported by Homer Hauptman, who played Matt Burke, the impulsive shipwrecked stoker. Directing was Gay Marr.

Most appreciated of the three was the tragedy, "The Children's Hour," with D. Ann Richards as Martha and Gladys Jackson as Karen in the leading roles. The play was a psychological analysis of the havoc and frustration a lie can create. Miss Jackson's performance was one of the finest of the evening. In a supporting role, as the selfish, despised, Mrs. Lily Mortar, Paula Woody proved quite adept at handling character roles. "The Children's Hour" was directed by Don Johnnes.

Jack MacDonald, portraying the title role, was the whole show in Molnar's "Liliom." As the moody, strong-headed amusement park barker, he was clearly in his own.

"Liliom," the forerunner of the American musical hit, "Carousel," relates the difficulties of a young man deciding his destiny. The setting is a carnival and the people are clearly the carnival type. Adding to the merits of the play were Mary Nelson as Marie and Shirlee Wallace as Julie. Dale Wisner, who also directed, amused the audience with his snappy portrayal of Liliom's pale, Ficusur.

The date for the next Actor's Lab production is Thursday, December 18.
