Call for Reporters . . .

There will be a few changes made in The Daily Nebraskan this coming semester. Changes with the idea in mind of giving you a better paper.

However, in making The Daily Nebraskan a paper that every student and faculty member on campus will want to read, the editorial staff needs your help.

We need new blood on the staff. A scarcity of reporters, coupled with a newsprint shortage and a surplus of advertising hampered publication last semester to the point where many important stories were omitted. The latter problem shows signs of improving, but The Daily Nebraskan still needs competent, hard-working students to serve as reporters.

During the first few weeks of the new semester, a system will be set up whereby all students reporting to The Daily Nebraskan will be classified as workers. Those men and women who show an aptitude and a willingness to work will eventually be considered reporters and paid space rates. They will be the only authorized reporters and the only students pointed under the activities rules.

In other words, the days of coming down to The Daily Nebraskan office, working for two or three days, and then retiring with the title of reporter and one activity point are done. All students will be considered but only a few, selected by the staff, will be named paid reporters.

The job is not an easy one since we are determined to publish a mature and interesting newspaper that will be a credit to the university and to the state. If you, as students, want a better paper, come to The Daily Nebraskan office and do something about it. But come down prepared to work hard and to put out a good daily college paper.
