Students Lose Skip Privileges In Frosh Orientation Classes

All freshmen are crying, "Woe is me." Why? No longer will the freshmen be able to sneak out of their orientation lectures. The entire freshman class has been given "the word" and are hopelessly planning to attend all orientations from now on.

As everyone knows, the attendance in orientation is checked by having the student write his name and the date on a slip of paper and passing it in. Freshmen are now getting the slips at the front door, going down to the front of the auditorium, writing their names on the paper and then giving it to friends to pass in. When no one is looking they cunningly sneak out of the side doors.

Seats Numbered.

To prevent this the seat numbers were also placed on the slips of paper and it was soon found that several people occupied the same seat during the lecture while many remained vacant. This made the Social Science auditorium look quite crowded in places, especially since as many as three to four students were listed to sit in the same seat. It is now being requested that students spread out more during the lectures.

Class Beneficial.

Of course, everyone should attend their scheduled orientations because it will benefit them greatly. The student learns how and why the university is here to help him. The various heads of several departments are the speakers and they can give new students many a great help. Many questions may confront a new student and those men are there to avoid some of these doubts in your mind. Also it should be said that the orientation class is not a place where you can get an extra 50 minutes of sleep. It doesn't help you any and it definitely hinders the lecturer and those near you that are trying to listen.

It is to the sorry of many a freshman that these measures have been taken, but it is really for the best. All the cunningness and forethought of freshmen will have to be utilized for some other purpose.

Good luck, freshmen.

Please, Professor

Did you see—male students trying to talk professor out of marking them absent on first day of hunting season. P. S. A six-weeks test that day.
