Carillon Bells Silenced by Machine Quirk

There was a time when students were awakened gently at the end of class by the melodious ringing of the Mueller carillon tower, but lately those awful classroom bells have been on the job again.

Charles Fowler, director of the Division of Buildings and Grounds, provided the answer Wednesday to the question of why the bells are no longer ringing.

Fowler said that a relay in a scaled compartment of the tower is stuck and University technicians can't get to it without forfeiting a service agreement with the company which installed the bells. The relay, according to Fowler, is an electro-magnet which is energized when current is thrown onto it or released.

The Schulmerich Electronics company of Sellersville, Pa., installers of the bells, is sending a man to repair them.

According to Fowler, the company agreed at the time of installation of the chimes to perform any needed repairing during the first year of operation. The company was notified a week ago and the repairman should be here at any time.

Fowler said that at present the relay is stuck open and would work only if it were held closed. It is located in a part of the tower that was sealed shut by the company at the time of installation.
