

Economics Professor Feels University Instructors Are Experiencing Unrest

legislature and the ideas of the governor they are going to elect (Seaton), the situation won't be corrected in the next two years and more professors will leave," predicted James.

Salary Reasons

He emphasized that the legislature has to realize that the most young men leave because of the salary and fringe benefits that the Legislature doesn't provide here.

"I think the legislators are still on the economy kick of four years ago," said James.

"My biggest concern is that I feel sorry for the students. They are the ones the legislature is short-changing. I also feel sorry for the administrators. They have to try to do an appropriate job with the money they have," said James.

The professor explained that he wanted to stay at Nebraska, but he had to think of the future.

Pay Increase

Harry Trebing, assistant professor of economics, is leaving the University for a position as associate professor at Indiana University.

Trebing said that he will receive a 28% increase in salary per nine months, but this doesn't give weight to fringe benefits and sabbatical leaves. (Trebing will receive an automatic leave for one year at half pay or a half year at full pay at the end of seven years).

Trebing explained that he decided to leave the University because of the long-range possibilities and future potential of the two schools.

"The economic department is young and maturing professionally. It has much potential. It is a real loss when these maturing people leave," said the professor.

Lack of Opportunity
"Lincoln is a very nice place in which to live, the Economics Department is a very nice department, has nice colleagues, but there is a lack of opportunity," said the Maryland native.

Explaining the economic and financial situation with the University and the state legislature, the economist said that the economy changes geographically and resources change with it. Nebraska can attempt to correct it, but if it is due to deep seated economic factors, there isn't much that can be done about it.

Trebing also warned against overlooking Nebraska's good possibilities and accomplishments of the past. He said that Nebraska is attractive, intelligent and has many pioneering firsts.

Robert C. Bingham, assistant professor of economics, is leaving Nebraska for Kent State University, Kent, Ohio.

Sabbatical Leave
He said that he will receive a 25% increase in salary per nine months. He will also receive sabbatical leaves.

The economist said that he believes that once you get a man it is cheaper to keep him than to replace him. "They certainly would not have had to offer us much to keep us in Nebraska," he continued.

Bingham explained that he was thinking not only about the present, but also about the future situation and that it didn't appear that the situation would change much. The legislature isn't going to do any differently considering what the political attitude is in the state towards the University.

He explained that Kent State College is professionally equated with Nebraska, the school is growing and it presents more opportunities.

Leave for Money

A. S. Hall is chairman of the economics department. He explained that people do leave for money. "The ones leaving this department will all make more money: $1500 in two cases and $1000 in another case," he continued.

"The inelasticity and rigidity of the financial situation with no more money for salary leaves no bargaining power," Hall stated. But, he emphasized, the professors would not have left for just the $1,000 or $2,000 a year; it is the good outlook which draws them.

"Nebraska is further behind than the schools to which they are going and it is not going to catch up. These people think of their family, education and dependents and prepare for the certainty of the future. "When you get behind, the harder it is going to be to catch up," he stated.

No Change Seen

"Nebraska lives in terms of hand-to-mouth existence and there is no indication that it won't end. I don't understand how people can call themselves 'conservative' when conservatives keep the assets they own."

The maintenance part of the budget suffered, which means that Nebraska isn't taking care of what it has in the physical sense," he continued.

"I'm extremely sorry to see Trebing go. He is an extremely promising young man. In ten years, he will be of national fame and would have brought much credit to the University," announced Hall.

The money it will cost Nebraska to replace these people could be put to more productive use he emphasized. Faculty salaries for new assistant professors are going up all the time.

Faculty Mobility

Hall said that he agrees with the idea of faculty mobility, but it is not in the students' interest when they leave because of monetary reasons. "You can't have a University of exodus," he concluded.

"The principle disadvantage Nebraska labors under is that it can't plan or promise ahead. The University is not a disagreeable place and the faculty is on the whole superior, but many of them are going to equal or better places.

"They are not bitter at the University, but other places offer equivalent opportunities plus more money.

"A man won't leave purely for money (if they do, we don't want them and they do not belong in the business), but the long-run monetary prospects and if the institution is good or better than Nebraska," concluded Hall.

Adam C. Breckenridge, dean of faculties, said that the average day of an academic year professor at Great Plains and Great Lakes land-grant colleges is $1,000 more per year than at Nebraska.

Dr. Ernest J. Burgi, associate professor audiologist and speech pathologist, is leaving for a position at the University of Pittsburgh.

Dr. Burgi explained that he is not unhappy with the University, but the professional and financial opportunities are better where he is going and the future will be most beneficial.

"There will not be any better of a University than the people are willing to support, and Nebraskans are conservative," concluded Dr. Burgi.

Johnston Given Health Service Grant for Study

An associate professor of chemistry at the University has received a $14,695 grant from the U.S. Public Health Service.

Dr. Robert B. Johnston will receive a one year award for his project, "The Metabolism of Thiol Esters of Amino Acids."

The project is an attempt to study the chemical mechanisms by which the enzymes of living cells operate, said Dr. Johnston.

The grant will enable him to study enzymic reactions, which assist in chemical transformations within cells. He is working with chemicals of the sulfa groups and amino acids which are important building blocks of proteins.

Dr. Johnston wishes to use his grant to study a suspected reaction producing a bond between the sulfa, the proteins and the amino acids.
