Q: What game can't you buy in Lincoln? A: Trivial Pursuit

By Jane Campbell

Trivial Pursuit is the hottest new game in the country right now, with sales of more than $1.5 million since being introduced in the United States last year.

Trivial Pursuit is a board game with dice, but players must answer trivia questions from six categories.

"People can't get enough of Trivial Pursuit," said John Moore, a spokesman for Selchow and Righter, which manufactures the game.

Bob Morand, owner of the Toy Room, 220 N. 66th St, said he gets 15 to 20 calls a day from people looking for the game. He said he stopped the waiting list after 36 names.

The last shipment of Trivial Pursuit games lasted half an hour at the Toy Room, Morand said. He said he doesn't know when the shipment he ordered more than six weeks ago will arrive.

The manufacturers sell the game to distributors, he said, and the distributors sell it to different regions. Because of this, Moore said, he doesn't know when or how many of the games will be sent to the Lincoln area.

Trivial Pursuit debuted in Canada in 1982, racking up 100,000 sales in the first year. Sales jumped to $2.5 million in 1983.

What kind of people play Trivial Pursuit?

"Everyone," said Blair Swing, a UNL senior majoring in construction management. "It crosses the age gap."

Swing said that when playing the game, he may not know the answers to a lot of questions, but his parents do. And there are many that he and his sister know about, but his parents do not.

Jeff Mitchell, a UNL senior in math and computer science, said he played Swing's Trivial Pursuit game four or five times a week.

"I've always been interested in weird facts," Mitchell said. "There's a lot of facts people don't know, but are interesting."

Mitchell said he enjoys Trivial Pursuit because it doesn't involve the luck of the dice as much as most other board games.

"It appeals to people who think they know a lot," he said.

But can something that sweeps the nation as quickly as Trivial Pursuit has be too good to last?

"Trivial Pursuit shattered the price resistance for board games," Moore said. Most games sell for around $25, but Trivial Pursuit costs $40.

"I think it says something if people are willing to invest in it," Moore said.

Four editions of the game will be available by the end of March, Moore said. That makes 24,000 different questions. If sales meet the $20 million mark by the end of this year, Trivial Pursuit will have more than 20 billion cards out, which is a world's record, Moore said.

"I don't think people will get tired of the game," Moore said. "No one is going to sit around and memorize 24,000 cards."
