Survey considers special interest housing at UNL

By Kirk Zebolsky

UNL may implement two or three special interest-only residence hall floors next fall resulting from the interest shown by residence hall students, according to a housing official.

Robert Brandt, complex program director of Selleck Quadrangle and chairman of the Special Interest Housing Committee, said it is considering adding an upper classmen floor, a mentoring floor and a quiet-hours floor to the residence halls.

A survey presenting 23 ideas for special interest floors was distributed in February to students in the residence halls. Brandt estimated that 1/3 of these students responded. About 40 percent of those responding asked to be contacted if any of the floors are implemented, he said.

Brandt said students also showed high interest in a music floor, a connoisseur floor, a wellness floor, a single-room floor and a suite floor.

The suite floor would be "apartment-like suites consisting of one double bedroom adjoining to a living-room area," according to the survey.

Brandt said the three floors the committee is considering for next fall could be implemented quickly and without construction. He said others would require more preparation.

Brandt said that implementing all the floors that students are interested in could take five years. He said he hopes to add more floors every year.

Brandt said the committee will recommend to the directors and assistant directors of housing that special interest housing be pursued.

Joe Petrick, Cather-Pound-Neihardt Complex Program Director, said he feels there is a need for certain types of special interest housing. He said two examples are needs for graduate housing and a quiet-hours floor.
