

'Ice Pirates' is vulgar calculated commercialism

Review by Stephanie Zink

The latest rage in film-making is space movies. Almost every situation that could happen in space has been filmed and released to its adoring public, but recently these space epics have been getting more and more unrealistic. One of these is The Ice Pirates which is — hopefully — a spoof of space adventure films.

The Ice Pirates consists of Jason (Robert Urich) the leader of the group, Roscoe (Michael D. Roberts) who is the second in command, and a couple of other obnoxious people. This crew tries to get the precious commodity of water (in the form of ice) away from the Templar Empire which has complete control over the galaxy's water supply.

Jason kidnaps Princess Karina (Mary Crosby) from the Templar ship. She turns out to be the daughter of an unnamed man who was supposedly killed trying to find the seventh planet which has an unending supply of fresh water.

There are so many things wrong with this movie that it's not even funny. First of all, the plot line is very confusing and hard to follow. If all the planets in the galaxy are so desperate for water, people in the movie shouldn't be able to get a drink in a bar that easily. In fact, there should have been no bars at all — but then they couldn't have had a scene mimicking the Star Wars Cantina scene.

Also, we're never sure if the purpose of these pirates is to save the galaxy from the Templar Empire's tyranny or if their goal is to get to the seventh planet.
