Working for $200,000.000

Plans are under discussion in California which, if successful, would make it possible to carry out hydraulic mining without injury to the farmers in the valleys and open up a large area of the richest gold fields in the world. The idea is to construct a large dam in the canyon to the east of Squawville, and build from there a mammoth flume to convey the water to the low lands around the bay. By this means the dam would catch and hold all the silt and debris, while the flume would lead the water away and deposit it on the high lands where it would accumulate and convert them into rich farms instead of leaving them, like a waste as at present.

Probably the most extensive portion of the work would be the dam, which would be about 500 feet in height and which would generate a head of water of 1000 feet. It would be sufficient to carry the flume by natural means and would give the hydraulic miners the maximum head of 1000 feet. An opportunity to work for $200,000,000. The cost of the dam is estimated at $20,000,000, with the flume and the necessary means of extracting it, and which would be the cost of the dam and the flume. It would be the cost of the dam and the flume.

An objection has been urged to the plan on account of the water being dammed up. It is said it would not interfere as the miners store their own water in reservoirs and can draw it off as they choose without interfering with the flume. It is pointed out that the dam would be the dam, which would be the dam, which would be the dam. It is pointed out that the dam would be the dam, which would be the dam.

A Frisco Silenus

Here is a condensed but revealing biography of a San Francisco millionaire written by Arthur McEwen for the Salt Lake Tribune. "I saw him in a boat the other evening at the wharves in San Francisco.
