THE PRESENCE OF MIXD OF JOHN BLUNI tor wheeled 'round and looked at him,

Written for The Bee. The tube that stuck out of the wall at the right of the gity editor's desk emitted a long, high-reyed, wailing note of distress. At least it was distress to the man who heard "it. Every day he threatened to have something done by way of having that speaking tube fixed, so it wouldn't give forth such bloodcurdling wails, and every day he forgot it, and so, every day for, seven or eight years, ever so many times a day, the city editor's spine was traversed by cold chills resultant from the shock of hearing the unholy cries of that speaking tube. One can't, one really can't get used to some things. Moreover, every time that screech came it was the city editor's custom to say "damn!" briefly and pointedly, so transportation." that it came to pass that when the voice Blunt murmured his surprised thanks, of the speaking tube was heard every reporter who was loafing in the city room would shake his fist with a vindictive gesture and say "damn!" under his breath. Then they would grin at each other as if something new had happened to tickle them. It is funny how the "old man's" idiosyncrasies amuse "the boys." The "old man" answered the call at the tube and then remarked, in a blunt, forcible way he had, which always made the young man whose name was spoken arop everything else and come to his door in double quick time: "Hornick!" "Yessir!" and Mr. Hornick, who was a big, tall, good-natured, bland young man, rose from his lounging position, took his pipe out of his mouth and flew to answer the summons.

"If Blunt comes in this afternoon," said the "old man," "tell him to go up to Mr. Burney's office at once. Mr. Bur-noy wants to see him." "Yessir," and Mr. Hornick returned to the contemplation of smoke rings and air castles.

The "Blunt" referred to was a certain John Blunt, who had attained more or less celebrity as a producer of sketches, verse, "special stuff" and syndicate let-ters, and was employed on the Continent as a special writer for the Sunday edition and for certain emergencies. He didn't do much work at the office, but used to stroll into the city room almost every day, throw his lengthy frame into a chair, his feet on a desk, and swap yarns with "the boys," who looked upon him variously (according to the length of time they had done regular newspaper work)—as a lazy, bright chap, who might make a good reporter if he dropped his indolent ways and "hustled," or as an especially fortunate fellow who had some reputation, "signed his stuff" and didn't have to do assignment and hark to the call of the city editor or the man at the desk. Blunt loafed in about 4 o'clock, which was his usual hour for appearing at the office. Blunt had a way of using the time which was peculiarly his own. He would rise at noon, cat, his breakfast at the time sensible persons take their luncheon and "respectable" persons have dinner, and then would drop in at his club, where he would while away the hours of the afternoon is one of the knot of idlers who talked at each other in the sunny corner of the south room, or would join the smaller, more animated "gambler's gang," and indulge in stupid whist or idiotic "freeze out" for two or three hours. Then he would drift in at various offices where he sold "stuff," visit a few minutes at each, then go to the Continent office, sit at the desk of his friend Hornick and "swap lies," as hereinbefore stated, with the reporters. After this, dinner; after dinner, nicotine; with some friend or other: then, last of all, somewhere about midnight he could be found in his den working like a Trojan, and this continued until about 4 o'clock a. m. All of which was a very sensible arrangement, barring the fact that it gained him the unenviable rep-to Hornick:

as he spoke, rapidly: "Mr. Blunt, you understand the work that has been mapped out for you to at-tend to this fall? Well, you will need to start in fresh on that. I have been thinking it over, and have decided that it wouldn't do you any harm to take a little rest-you see, I know how much you work, whether others do or not. Now, every man on this paper gets a two-weeks' vacation every year, with salary for that time paid in advance. I want you. Mr. Blunt, to drop all the work you have on hand-everythingand put in what is left of July, and the month of August, at the summer resorts. Your salary will be paid now for that time, and we shall expect from you only time, and we shall expect from you only such letters as you may feel like sending us—preferably, one breezy letter from each place to which you may happen to go. That's all. Come in and see me to-morrow when you get ready to leave. The cashier will fix you for money and and stumbled out. Had the millennium arrived, unheralded? He stopped out-side and pinched himself, to make sure that he, John Blunt, grinder-out of "special stuff," was awake and uninfluenced by liquor. Then, very sensibly, he decided that his senses had not de-ceived him, and he went in and told "Dubs" of the luck that had come his way—whereat "Dubs" smiled expan-sively, and was presently seen, in com-pany with the "special," looking ex-pectantly over a tall counter at a whitecoated, white-aproned, hair-oiled, natty personage, who was mixing something into some cracked ice which reposed in a tall glass.

John Blunt chose Forest lake as the resort which he would first favor with his presence. Forest lake was not a "popular" summer resort. This fact was rather in its favor than otherwise, although there are persons who might not think so. It happened to be one of those small, quiet places of which few of the resort-going public ever hear, but which are delightful in their very insignificance and exclusiveness. At Forest lake one was quite, quite certain not to find the sweet-scented dry goods clerk or the ubiquitous, otherwise, en-tirely offensive dude. Only a few families had cottages at Forest lake-of these, those who had no grandfathers had enough money to make them forgivable-and but one hotel existed, and that one was rather undersized, perfectly kept, and very particular as to whom it sheltered.

So, naturally, Forest lake was quiet, and that was what John Blunt wanted. He had a half-defined plot for what might prove to be the long looked for Great American Novel; he wanted quiet in which to let the aforesaid plot de-velop, and conceived that Forest lake would be just the place to help him out. He was perfectly right, and his plans might have worked beautifully had it not been for one fact. At Forest lake, on the very night of his arrival, he met Somebody he Knew. Now, ordinarily, this state of affairs is inconsequential. One may, almost anywhere, meet some one one has met elsewhere, but one usually feels privileged to shun him or her somewhat after the interchange of ordinary courtesies. In this case, however, it was different. The Somebody involved was not a person who could, should or would be passed by with he scant attentionst which (Allah be praised!) it is our privilege, our inalien-able God-given right to half bestow upon our fellow beings who live and breathe and have their being for some inscrutable reason, and who must (for they move about) be met and associated with.

penniless scribbler monopolized his PAYING DEALS IN FUTURES daughter. In fact, so apprehensive was he that he mentioned the matter to the young woman herself one morning. He was very anxious, he assured her, that she make a suitable and worthy alliance; and he viewed with disfavor the attentions of this young man, who, while worthy enough in some ways, was a no-body and penniless at that. "And I trust," he added, "that you will give him no encouragement, for I should certainly decline, Harriet, to consent to your-your becoming encaged to him." your-your becoming engaged to him." Whereat Harriet, who had been listening smilingly throughout, blushed pret-tily, and said, laughingly: "Nonsense, papa! The very idea! Why, neither of us ever dreamed of such why, hetther of us everyreamed of such nonsensical things." And then she tripped away to join the "penniless no-body," who was tinkering with the row-locks of her boat down at the landing, while Mamma Devens, a gentle smile on her sweet face, leaned back in her chair and backed at the minimum to the sweet face. and looked at the pair approvingly. It was not so very, very long since Ralph Devens, millionaire, was a "penniless nobody," yet he had never been less dear to her for all that, nor had that state of affairs ever detracted from her happiness. Mamma Devens had a young heart and a sneaking affection for penniless, bright young men. John Blunt being an object of special preference. All of which was well enough, so far as it went, for John Blunt. For, be it known, the statement made by Harriet Devens on that bright morning had been half un-advised assertion, half fib. That both those young persons had had at least some thought of the "nonsensical things" referred to so lightly by Harriet was demonstrated that evening. The weather and the hour were propitious, the moon shone caressingly, the voices of the night sang of romance—and John Blunt, who had been rowing "double" with Miss Devens, chose that occasion to tell her something that had been keeping him awake c'nights, and sug-gested the advisability of their rowing double through life, just this way (which mode of putting the proposition has been used by love-lorn young men who propose in boats, from time immemorial, each thinking it entirely original)-to which suggestion Miss Devens was fain to confess she was more than inclined to be favorable, although she expressed some strong doubts as to what her father might think on the subject.

For almost eighteen hours they were very, very happy. They lay awake that night, of course, thinking of each other, and both were up betimes next morning. each to catch an early glimpse of the other. But in the afternoon a terrible thing occurred to mar their new-found happiness. John Blunt, who went, in his manly, straightforward way, to in-terview Papa Dovens on the subject nearest his heart, was rebuffed, re-buked, seorned and soundly berated for his presumption, and the face he brought out from that interview was a very long one, indeed. Harriet cried a little on his shoulder as they stood, for a few minutes in a quiet corner of the hall, then tried to look cheerful and encourage him. But it was not much use, and presently John Blunt, smarting with the knowledge that in future he might see Harriet but seldom, excepting sub rosa, left the house and walked down to the lake to think. He stopped at the Devens boat house for a racquet he had left there that morning, and sat down in the shade to have his think out. It was not a very pleasant think, as almost any young man who has been simi-larly situated can testify. John Blunt was partly dazed, partly in a rage, and it was some time before he could bring himself to view the matter in a manner in any wise calm. His heart was very bitter as he gazed moodily out over the ganization were given into the hands of an able committee, of which Mr. B. F. Jacobs was one. The Sunday school workers of the other lands entered cordially into the work, and the delegates were welcomed to the world's metropo-lis on July 2 of the year named by the lord mayor, and the earl and countess of Aberdeen and other titled and untitled English men and women united to make it pleasant for them. The American delegates numbered over 250, and they went to England on board the Cunard steamer Bothnia, which they chartered for the occasion. Many conflicting claims as to who originated the Sunday school idea have been put forth, and it is hard in the light of the facts that have been disclosed of late years to decide as to whom the credit is due. Robert Raikes, a printer and publisher of a small newspaper in Gloucester, Eng., was undoubt edly the first whose work attracted gen eral attention and imitation. He got his idea, however, from a Mrs. Bradburn, who had been a teacher in a Sunday school established in 1769 by Hannah Ball. Raikes started his first school in 1780, and in 1783, 210 years ago, it had become sufficiently successful in his eyes to warrant the publication of an article concerning it in his paper, the Gloucester Journal. He also wrote an article about the school, which was published

Preceding the main convention there were meetings of various auxiliary bodies, such as the International Conference of Field Workers and the International Sunday School conference. The attendance of delegates at the latter was about 2,000. which is expected to be largely increased at the meeting tomorrow. Some idea of the significance of the convention may be obtained from a brief reference to previous gatherings of the same nature. The Field Workers' con-vention is the first of its kind. The international convention is the evolution of the national convention, and is the twelfth gathering of that body, as well as the seventh of the international. Its sessions are held once in three years, and it was organized at the sixth national convention in May, 1875, at Baltimore. The sixth international conven-tion was held at Pittsburg in 1800, and Hon. John G.
