Can I Be Beautiful?

Yes! Mme. M. Yale has discovered the ecret by which everyone may become pleassecret by which everyone may become pleasing and attractive. Nothing so detracts thing, says she, and then the thought, from the appearance of men and women as thin, faded or partially gray hair. Your creator never intended gray hairs to come at forty or fifty, and scarcely at sixty. Worry or hard work or the demands of society have bidden amid your soft, brown hair, or in the wavy tresses that once rivaled the raven's These changes come so quickly that "I saw you," says Carlton, in a low, tender voice. "I waited—it was hard—but you looked so like an angel ministering that I subdued myself. What were you saying to that little didf."

"I saw you," says Carlton, in a low, tender voice. "I waited—it was hard—but friend of yours." He points deliberately at Carlton. "Pray, introduce me. I am always, my dear sir, delighted to meet any of Lady Straugway's friends." that little idiot?"

"I was giving her a word of advice. I saw her today with-well-names are better stern, commanding, suppressed, aren't they?-but with a man that a little girl like her should not even I was telling her to have nothing o do with him."

"So bad as that?" "For one thing, he is married."
"Good heavens! married, and-"

'Yes; he has evidently pursued her here 'I can't. I can see you only."

"He's no sense of decency, then." "He was born, no doubt, without that troublesome sense."

'And his wife?"

"She-left him some time ago."
"A mistake," says he, indifferently. He is really hardly thinking of what he is saying, but his tone coming on her quickened mood is as a touch upon a wound.

"You think, then, that a woman should cleave—that," bitterly, "is the scriptural term, isn't it?—to the most contemptible of "And your one?" God's creatures until her heart is utterly She hesitates. broken and her spirit and body have lost

An admirable institution, if con-siderably wanting in some ways. This chance acquaintance of yours must be a contemptible fellow. I must say I despise heartily the man or woman who under false colors makes love or permits it to be made.

But let us leave this stupid subject. What has it got to do with us, my dearest?"
"Why, nothing, nothing!" a little wildly. "Of course not. Then, why waste time over ot. You have wasted a good deal over Miss "Tomorr Amy. Do you know," with a fond laugh, "I feel a little jealous of her? You have behaven like an angel of light to her. You "Ah!" The cry is low, but piercing. To him it speaks only of love, and love, indeed, is its dominant note; but in it there is despair, too, and anguish, and memories of the past—the dreadful past that, in spite of all one's mental narcotics, can never be wholly out to sleep. Passionately she turns to him, iolding out her arms and sinking into his.

Nothing of it remains. You have told me something of it, and I have guessed the rest. It "he pauses, bending over her—"it was a martyrdom." "It was hell!" says she in a hoarse, stifled whisper. It shocks him, but quite suddenly her mood changes. She lifts herself and quickly rahamans in the same of the says that the same of the says that the same of the same o quickly, vehemently presses her lips to his. What good is the past to any one? Who cares for it? It is past, and done with. And tomorrow"— She threw back her lovely head and laughs alond. "Temorrow, you will take me away-away-away."

She pauses. A queer sob seems to choke

"What is it, darling?" says Carlton, anxiously. Her manner seemed forced, unreal. "Oh, nothing," impatiently, "But Constantinople is far away, isn't it?" "From this? Well, pretty far. But," in a troubled tone, "there is something the matter with you tonight. I can see it in your eyes. Do you think you could deceive

"It is a lie!" says he, vehemently, looking only at Clare. "Deny it!" His voice is "Deny it!" His voice is

She, too, has risen. "It is the fruth," says she, in a dying tone, "Leave me now," She looks full at him, and he can see that her eyes are brilliant with pain, her lips-her dear lips, white

"Later on I will explain. But go now-go!"
The voice des away. Upon the terrace Carlton paces up and down with but one thought in his mind. To see her, to upbraid her, to leave her. For a moment he rests by the railings, and even as he does so he finds her beside him. She lays her small white hands upon the railings, too, very close to his, and looks up at him with with clear, open eyes. There is no shame n them-no change-nothing save the old,

He returns her glance with a terrible anger his. "Is it your part to question?" "Let me have my one question," says she, quickly. "You can have all the rest,"

"After all, it can wait," says she, "Ask me anything you like now, and I will answer you." Then, inconsequently, as becomes a weman; "does it seem too bad for you? Can you find no excuse, knowing all you do? Knowing-of him?" Timidly she lays her hand on his, but he flings it back. "What did you mean? What did you hope "I hoped for love-a thing I had never yet known. I heped for a happiness I had never so much as dared to dream of before, I hoped -- she flings up her head-"for life

He is silent, he is thinking of that little hand he has flung from him.
"I hoped, too," says she, quite evenly, with the evenness of despair, "that once out of the beaten track of the world the fact of my having a husband alive would never be discovered-would, at all events, never reach you. I thought, I was sure, he would never "Oh, fool," says he passionately,

"Do you know what you are saying?" asks he, deeply agitated. "Would you willingly, open-eyed destroy yourself?"
"I shall certainly destroy myself if I stay here—if you desert me," says she, quite caimly. "I shall live for you—or die." A little flash of her eyes turns on the restless, flowing river.
