ers, upon whose judgment they can rely. Some houses thus retain as many as six such readers, and very often a manuscript book must pass through the hands of all these, taking its turn with scores of others, before a decision is reached concerning it. Each reader hands in a written opinion as to its merits and demerits, its chances of success or failure. Sometimes, if these opinions are conflicting, the publisher bands them all, to-which he does not approve. He may already have accepted as many books as he cares to issue in that year. This one may he inter-esting, but badly written, or it may be beautifully expressed, but as dull as dish-water. Thus an endless list of "mays," "la" and "buts" present themselves, by any one of which the face of the book may be influenced. The one question to which they all had ta:

The one question to which they all lead in: "Will it pay? If so, we will publish it; if not, we won't." Of course publishers and publishers' read-ers sometimes make mistakes concerning the value of a hock and decline one that in the hands of another publisher, or brought out at
