(Copyright, 1805, by A. H. Hawkins.) CHAPTER IV.

At this instant in the room in the gate tower of the castle overlooking the most there had fallen a dead silence. Here Count Nikolas had raised the princess, set her on a south, and waited till her faintness and fright were gone. Then he had come near mind. For him indeed the dice were now cast; he had in his fury and fear dared all. He was calm now, with the calmness of a man at a great turn of fate. That room, he told her, she should never leave alive, save as his promised wife, sworn and held to secreey and silence by the force of that bond and of her oath. If he killed her he must die, whether by his own hand or the king's mattered little. But he would die for a great cause and in a great attempt. "I shall not e called a cheating gamester, madame," said he, a smile on his pale face. "I choose death scener than dishoner. Such is my choice. What is yours? It stands between death and silence, and no man but your husband will dare to trust your silence." "You dare not kill me," said she de-wife I would die a thousand times. For a cheat you are—a cheat—a cheat." And her voice rose till he feared that she would be heard, if any one chanced to listen, even from so far off in the hall. Yet he made one more effort, seeking to move her by an appeal to which women are not wont to be "A chest, yes!" said he, "I, Nikolas of Festenburg, am a chest. I say it, though no other man shall while I live to hear him.

But to gain what stake? "Why, my brother's castle of Zenda." "I swear to you it was not." he cried. coming nearer to her. "I did not fear losing on that cast, but I could not endure not to on that cast, but I could not endure not to win. Not my stake, madame, but yours,

"Then commend your soul to God. For in "Then commend your soul to God. For in one minute you shall die,"

Still she stood motionless; and he began to come near to her, his sword now drawn in his hands. And, coming within the distance from which he could strike her, he paused and gazed into her eyes. She answered him with a smile. Then there was for an instant utter stillness in the room, and in that instant the bishop of Modenstein set his foot on the staircase and came running up. On a degree of the distance is the could give back no more; and, since he knew by now that the bishop was his master with the sword, a desperate rage settled upon him, and, determining to die swiftly since die he must, he rushed forward, making on the staircase and came running up. On a on the staircase and came running up. On a sudden Osra heard the step and a gleam flashed in her eye. The count heard it also and his sword was arrested in its stroke. A smile came on his face. He was glad of the coming of some one whom he might kill in fight, for it turned him sick to butcher Yet he dared not let her go to cry his cheating in the streets of Strel-

The steps came nearer. He dropped his sword on the floor and sprang upon her. A shriek rang out, but he pressed his hand on her mouth and seized her in his arms. She had no strength to resist and he carried her swiftly across the room to a door in the wall. He pulled the door open—it was very massive and heavy—and he flung her roughly down on the stone floor of a little chamber, square and lofty, having but one small win-dow high up through which the moonlight scarcely pierced. She fell with a moan of pain. Unheeding he turned on his heel and shut the door. And as he turned he heard a man throw himself against the door of the room. It also was strong, and twice the man flung himself with all his strength against it. At last it strained and gave way and the bishop of Mondenstein burst into the room breathless. And he saw no trace of the princess' presence, but only Count Nikolas standing sword in hand in front of the door in the wall with a sneering smile on his ways that he rather deplored than gloried in it, and that when a man of his sacred profession was forced to use the weapons of this world it was a matter of grief to him, not of vaunting. But the king compelled him by urgent requests to describe the whole matter, while the princess was never weary of telling all that she knew or of blessing all bishop for the sake of the bishop of Modenst in Yet the bishop blamed himself, perhaps, if the truth were known, not for the necessity that drove him to what he did, as for a secret and ashamed joy that he detected in himse'f. For certainly, as he bur t into the room now, there was no sign of reluciance or unwilling-ness in his face; he took off his feathered cap, bowed politely to the count, and, resting the point of his sword on the floor, asked:

"My lord, where is the princ ss?"
"What do you want here, and who are you?" cried the count, with a blasphemous to her and in brief, harsh tones told her his oath. "When we were boys together, you knew Frederick of Hentzau. Do you not now know the bishop of Modenstein?" "Bishop! This is no place for bishops. Get back to your prayers, my lord."

"It wants some time yet before matins."

answered the bishop. "My lord, where is the princess? "What do you want with her?" "I am here to escort her wherever it may be her pleasure to go." He spoke confidently, but he was in his heart alarmed and uncasy because he had not found the prince; "I do not know where she is," said Nikolas of Festenburg. "My lord, you lie," said the bishop of Modenstein.

The count had wanted nothing but an excuse for attacking the intruder. He had it now, and an angry flush mounted in his cheeks as he walked across to where the bishop stood. Shifting his sword to his left of the United States by the superstructure hand, he struck the bishop on the face with his gloved hand. The bishop smiled and sissippi river between Rock Island and Dayturned the other cheek to Count Nikolas, who struck him again with all his force, so that lord, and discuss this matter. Our dispute will disturb and perhaps alarm the princess." And a man might-have read the purpose in his eyes, though his manner and words were gentle; for he had sworn in his heart that the count should not escape.

But the count cared little for the presence of the princess as he had for her dignity, her honor, or her life; and now that she was no longer wholly at his mercy, but there was a rew chauce that she might escape, his rage and the fear of exposure lashed him to fury: and, without more talking, he made at the bishop, crying, "You first and then her! I'll be rid of the pair of you!" The bishop faced him, standing between Princess Osra and his assault; while she shrank back a little, sheltering herself behind the heavy door. For, although she had been ready to die without fear, yet the sight of guard. For ten years or more he had not used his sword, but the secret of its mastery seemed to revive fresh and clear in his mind. seemed to revive fresh and clear in his mind, and let his soul say what it would, his body rejoiced to be at the exercise again; so that his blood kindled and his eyes gleamed in the glee of strife. Thus he stepped forward, guarding himself, and thus he met the count's impetuous onset; and he neither flinched nor gave back, but finding himself holding his county and the present of the seements of the seements. Inspector McLaughlin, who prepared the roll, says that there are about 150 direct own he pressed on and on, not violently at-tacking and yet never resting, and turning Osra gazed with wind the street oaths breath, and Count Nikolas muttered oaths and grew more furious, the bishop seemed as gay as when he talked to the king, more gayly, maybe, than bishops should. Again his eye danced as in the days when he had been called the "wildast of the Hentzaus."

And still he drove Count Nikolas back and the complete by Monday evening. As soon as the exact number of claimants is decided upon he will be detailed to make payments.

Now behind the count was a window which made low and wide, in order that he might look from it over the surrounding country, but in time of war it was covered with a close and strong iron grating. But now the grating was off and the window open; and beneath this window was a fall of seventy feet or hard upon it into the most below. a desperate lunge at his enemy. But the bishop parried the lunge, and, always seem-ing to be about to run the count through the body, again forced him to retreat, till his back was close to the opening of the window. Here Nikolas stood, his eyes glaring like a madman's; then a sudden devilish smile spread over his face.

'Will you yield yourself, my lord?" cried the bishop, putting a restraint on the wicked impulse to kill the man, and lowering his point for an instant.

In that short moment the count made his last throw; for all at once, as it seemed, and almost in one motion, he thrust and wounded the bishop in the left side of his body, high in the chest, near the shoulder, flowed freely; then, drawing back his sword, he seized it by the blade half-way up and flung it like a javelin at the princess, who stood still by the door, breathlessly watching the fight. By an ace it missed her head, and it pinned a tress of her hair to the door and quivered deepset in the wood of the door. When the bishop of Modenstein saw this, hesitation and mercy passed out of this, hesitation and mercy passed out of his heart, and though the man had now no weapon, he thought of sparing him no more than he would have spared any cruel and savage beast; he drove his sword into his body, and the count, not being able to endure the thrust without flips they were the the count. the thrust without flinching, against his own will gave way before it. Then came from his lips a loud cry of dismay and dispair, for at lips a loud cry of dismay and dispair, for at the same moment that the sword was in him he, staggering back, fell wounded to death through the open window. The bishop looked out after him, and Princess Osra heard the sound of a great splash in the water of the moat below. For very horror she sank against the door, seeming to be held up more by the sword that had pinned her hair than by her own strength. Then came up through the window, from which the bishop still looked with a strange smile, the clatter of a hundred feet running to the gate of the castle. The bridge was let down; the confused

bishop saw them from the window and leant

out crying:

"Yes, I have killed him. So perish all such villains!"

And when they looked up and saw in the moon light the bishop's face, they were amazed. But he hastily drew his head in, so that they might not see him any more. For he knew that his face had been flerce, and exultant, and loyful.

exultant, and joyful. Then dropping his sword, he ran across to the princess and drew the count's sword, that was wet with his own blood, out of the door, releasing the princess' hair; and seeing that she was very faint he put his arm about her and led her to the couch; and she sank down upon it, trembling and white as her white gown and murmuring, "Fearful, fearful!" and she clutched his arm and for a long while she would not let him go; and her eyes were fixed on the count's sword that lay on the floor by the entrance of the little room.
