CRIPPLES RIDING A GAME RACE. Rest of the Bicycle Riders Unable to

It has the call over all ports, excepting the great national game, base ball. Last night the stands and base ball. Last night the stands and bleachers were filled to overflowing long before the race begun. Everybody was out for a good time, and they had it. Despite the fact that there was nothing of a thrilling character about the race up to the grand finale, they kept the summer air resonant with their cheering all through the evening and when the climax came, pandemonium itself was cut loose.

With bandaged limbs and lusterless eyes they appeared on the track last night. But both were full of pluck and the plaudits of the admiring multitude had its effects. They braced up as if after a long and hearty draught at Ponce de Leon's mystic spring. They rode as only genuine thoroughbreds can ride. But it was unreasonable to expect anything out of the ordinary at their hands. They were content to hold their own and see that no one else did any more.

Mierstein, the fractious Sioux City kid was as full of vim as a Pawnee cur is of fleas, and Holton, too, was in fine fettle. But this counted for little. Try as hard as they might they could do nothing with the two "crips." Hall and Schrader were both on their mettle and kept the gang on the hustle all the evening and it was only by the most judicious factics that the rest of the string were enabled to hold their own. Streeter, the Cedar Rapids phenom, pulled out entirely. He realized that it was a forlern hope, and stabled his tube steed to avoid humiliation.
