

IN THE DOMAN OF WOMAN.

A FAMOUS WOMAN DESIGNER.

Plenty of Fame and Money Earned by Originating Patterns.

"Yes, the work is most fascinating," said Miss Gloriosa Bell, in answer to my question as we stood looking at an exquisite design of corbels slightly conventionalized, upon a cardboard four or five feet square, ready to be sent to Ireland, whence it will be returned to the United States in time for the great linen sales of next January.

Miss Bell is one of the very few artists in America who design exclusively for table linen; and so charmingly effective and adaptable is her work that she has been solicited several times over to furnish designs for famous European houses. She is, however, under contract to one of the largest firms in America, with whom she has arranged for the sale of her designs. Her designs are not only original, but they are also practical, and she earns a very large yearly income.

Miss Bell has been passionately devoted to drawing from childhood, and has had the benefit of a course in art at the Art Institute of Chicago, and later on won her B. A. at the university. She, however, never had any specific training in design, but seems to have been born with the gift fully developed. Her father, who is at the head of the department in a large establishment, brought her home one day, while she was still in the High school, an unsatisfactory design, and asked if she could not readapt it. She made the attempt, and was so successful that she began at once to try her hand at original designs, and was not long before she met with immediate and eager acceptance.

"What are my methods? Well, fashion, you know, changes nearly as often in table linen as in sleeves. There is always some prevailing idea that comes through all lines of artistic manufacture—wall papers, carpets, furniture, draperies, etc. It seems to be in the air, and not infrequently originates in the arts themselves. For example, take Napoleon articles, the marines, and 'N's,' hawknets, wreaths, etc., were endlessly repeated in the arts and crafts. As a reaction from the small, delicate, conventional patterns of that period, everything must be on a large scale, and done with a free hand. My table linen designs must, of course, be more or less determined by the general trend of the public taste. The poppy and chrysanthemum, naturally grouped, were among the most popular, although I prefer designs, and I expect these orchids to have a similar vogue next season. It usually takes me about ten days to complete a design. I then enlarge it to the size it will be in the table cloth, drawing with a hard pencil on medium cardboard one full corner, with a corresponding portion of the center. In exactly this form it goes to our manufacturers in Ireland and Scotland. The difference in the sizes of the cloths is made by increasing or diminishing the space between the border and the center. Whenever it is possible I draw directly from nature, frequently using colors in the beginning for the better study of shading. Yes, the work keeps me occupied the year round, although I am much busier at some seasons than at others. Just now, for instance, I have orders for a large number of designs, that must be sent to our manufacturers in Europe at the earliest possible moment, in order to be ready for next year's trade. I am, therefore, forced to use every bit of available daylight."

HOTELS FOR WOMEN.

Do Working Women Prefer to Live by Themselves?

In view of the number of women now engaged in business and the professions, says the Chicago Tribune, it is not surprising that a hotel to be managed and used by women alone is announced as soon to be opened in the downtown section of Michigan avenue.

In a recent article on "Municipal Affairs," John Lloyd Thomas declares that in New York City alone there are from 60,000 to 70,000 self-supporting women and recites the formation of a company to erect in that city a woman's hotel to accommodate 500 guests, the rooms to cost not less than $3 per week, board to vary according to the choice of the guest and the rules to be only such as obtain in ordinary hotels. He asserts that there is an urgent demand there for "comfortable and cheap hotels for women," managed on a business basis, that women can and will live together in them and that abuses can be avoided in them as easily as in ordinary hotels. Indeed, he declares that there exists "a rapidly increasing need for all grades of permanent lodging for women, beginning with the little orphan cash girl who works from 8 in the morning until 6 at night for $2.50 a week and ending with the gentleman who through misfortune suddenly finds herself confronted with the problem of how to earn her daily bread." This need, however, he alleges to be especially marked in the case of women of incomes from $40 to $50 per month, who not constituting a defined group like working girls, have won less attention to their residential needs.

Since the conspicuous failure many years ago of the Park Avenue hotel, designed for women alone, the feasibility of women's hotels has been the subject of much doubt. It is claimed, however, that needless and middle-class regulations killed that project and that no such fate need befall such an enterprise today.

It is doubtful if many women would prefer thus to live apart by themselves and it is probable that in most cases they would feel as free and as much at home in an ordinary hotel, with its possibilities of privacy, as in one exclusively for their own sex. The chief reason why a women's hotel will succeed, if it will succeed, is the fact that through greater simplicity in arrangement and management a given degree of comfort can there be secured at a lower charge than in the usual hotelery.

The segregation, however, of women from men in their ordinary lives is not a thing to be desired and while in cases it may involve an improvement upon otherwise trying conditions, it must still be considered as a specialized and more or less abnormal social condition.

STORIES OF ROSA BONHEUR.

"Buffalo Bill" Gift to Her—A Fortunate Autograph Hunter.

Mme. Isbert, a well known miniature painter of Paris, says a letter from the French capital once visited Rosa Bonheur at By, and in the course of their conversation brought out an album in which she said Mme. Bonheur might be interested. It nearly all the great names in the literary and artistic world of France for the last fifty or sixty years were inscribed. Rosa Bonheur put on her spectacles, and drawing her chair up to the table, spread out the album before her. Immediately she became intensely interested in its contents. There were pen and ink sketches, water colors, a few measures of music, poetry and philosophical and witty sayings, signed by such men as Melanconer, Corot, Milhaud, Salnte Beuve, Balzac, Victor Hugo, Dumas, Gounod, Massenet, etc. Looking up from the last page the artist said abruptly:

"And now I suppose you want Rosa Bonheur's name here; that is why you bring it." With a most comical expression on her bright little face she peered over her spectacles at Mme. Isbert, who, much confused, stammered meekly that she would be greatly honored to receive such notice. The artist declared that she would be charmed to be in such good company, and, in her usual businesslike way, took the measure of the page promising to draw something and send it in a short time.

A few years ago Mme. Bonheur wanted to paint a picture of the wild little American pony of the plains, of which she had often heard. She owned Arab, Norman and Percheron horses, but had no animal in her stables to serve as a model for this new picture. "Buffalo Bill," hearing of the artist's desire, gave her two typical broncos, and, using them as models, she produced an artistic picture, pronounced by critics at the time to be equal to the best of her previous work. Not long afterward, in recognition of Colonel Cody's kindness, Mme. Bonheur painted and gave him a portrait of himself.

The following amusing description of her appearance and manner was given by a newspaper writer who paid her a visit some years ago and sought to obtain what the artist most dreaded and avoided—an interview:

"A funny-looking man came toward me knitting his brows. He wore an enormous straw hat. Under it was a soft, beardless face, browned by the sun and lighted by chestnut-colored eyes, a small nose exaggerated the size of the large mouth, with rows of superb teeth, and there was a breezy flow of long hair.

"Who are you? Where do you come from and what do you want?" he said sharply, and without trusting his small hands in the pockets of gray, ribbed trousers.

"This sharp questioning disconcerted me for a moment, but, recovering, I answered: 'I am a journalist, and wish to see Miss Bonheur.'

"Well, look at her," said the little peasant, taking off his great hat. 'You must excuse me; I am obliged to keep intruders away.'

It is interesting to note that Mme. Bonheur had no patience when she was at the head of an art school with attempts on the part of her girl students to imitate her peculiarities of dress. With her these oddities had come about naturally and for good reasons; and then it was affectation, which she would not tolerate.

CASHING HER FIRST CHECK.

Experience of Young Women Taught Well the Truth.

While on a visit to New York not long ago a girl had occasion to cash a check. She hadn't much experience in such things and she wasn't quite sure how it ought to be done, but she thought the best way was to present the document at the bank upon which it was drawn. At 5 o'clock, the hour at which suburban banks open, the girl presented herself at the portals of the metropolitan institution, and among the two or three scrubwomen were the only human beings in sight, and the girl could not help but feel that she was in a strange place. She felt that she was not to come around again until, oh, well, not until 11 o'clock at any rate. At that hour the girl returned, to find the bank in full working order. She first inquired the check number, and with an extra flourish to the teller she always drew at her autograph; then, after presenting it at four wrong windows, she handed it at what she hoped was the right one. Apparently it was the right window, but—"H'm," said the man at the window, glancing at the number—"You're all right—ah—how any way of identifying yourself, Miss Blank?"

"Oh, no, indeed," replied the girl, sweetly, not having the least idea what he was talking about. "Er—well," went on the man, "you know some one, of course, who can assure us that you are Miss Blank?" "No one at all," answered the girl in George Washington cherry tree accents—she had always been told to speak the truth, and it was a fact that at that time she knew no one in the big city save the editor who had given her the check. The girl art student whom she was visiting didn't count. "H'm," said the man at the window; "oh, well," with a scrutinizing glance at the girl, "you probably do most of your shopping when you come to town at Ellis & Inches across the street. They might identify you." "We do all our shopping at Boston," replied the girl, who comes from a suburb of the Hub. "I never bought anything in a New York shop until this week."

The man looked again at the check, then he looked again at the girl. A queer look came into his eyes. "Excuse me one moment, Miss Blank," he said; "I'll just see—" and he vanished. By this time the girl was getting a little impatient. "He wasn't going to give her the money? Why then, if the check was, made out in her own name, and with her own name, that she had written herself, right on the back of it. Suddenly the girl remembered that in her pocketbook she had several visiting cards; that, of course, would identify her, and, with a happy smile, she offered one of these to the man when he returned to the window. "Oh, it's all right, Miss Blank," he cried, without glancing at the proffered card, and in tones almost of self-arrangement. "Of course it's all right. Here's the money," counting out the notes—the check was for $75—"so sorry to have given you any trouble. Anything we can do for you at any time, remember—good morning."

"Humph!" said the girl's father when he heard the story. "The fellow had no right to do it. It was a risky business, I don't care who by the way, was he young?"

"He—he wasn't very old," answered the girl.

BACHELOR GIRL COLONIES.

Pleasant Homes Provided for New York's Self-Supporting Women.

Several of the up-town women, right in the heart of upper tenion, says a New York letter, live the colonies of bachelor girls of New York. They are women of refinement and culture, some means and undoubted business capacity, with ideals beyond the hall bedroom and its flowerless and lonesome environments and at the same time they are women who are alone in this city and self-supporting. To such women "how to live" becomes a question of absorbing and irritating moment. Driven by one after another of the expenses of business life here to seek new quarters as the city moves uptown, they do not know where to turn until the common law of necessity drives them into communism. They do not call themselves by any high sounding name, or by any name at all, but they just get together to form some sort of a co-operative establishment that will give them a general table, a roof tree and a place to call home.

"Oh, you know, we can live so much better and cheaper this way," they said, when I questioned some of them.

"And you never quarrel?" I asked.

"Oh! you ought to see how well seven women can get along together," they answered, laughing.

The colonies have for their typical that a set of eight shut-off rooms—not a continuous flat, with everybody running in and out and no place to call one's own, but a room with a door leading to a common bathroom. Marble figures, statuettes, etc., can be cleaned by using a paste of whiting and water, allowing it to dry, and brushing off with soft brush. Smoke made from burning a piece of gum camphor will clear a bedroom of mosquitoes. Wall paper can be cleaned if wiped with dry Indian meal on a dry cloth. Do not rub colors. Grease stains in carpet can be removed while fresh if coarse brown paper is placed over the stain and ironed with a warm iron. Or cover spots with Indian meal; remove when grease is dried through the ammonia in water for washing woodwork. Better still, use kerosene oil instead of water to remove finger marks or stains, then wash. Very little force is necessary and varnish, oil or paint are not injured. Use whiting in the water for washing white delicate fabrics of painted wood—of bedsteads, etc. Clean piano keys with soft rag dipped in alcohol. Use same for cleaning prisms on candelabra or chandeliers. Use salts of lemon for the stains on ivory.

OUT OF DATE JEWELRY.

Old Fashioned Designs Are Rapidly Coming Into Favor.

"By the way," said a fashion oracle, "bring forth now all your old-fashioned jewelry, for it is decidedly to the fore, and old boxes and jewelry cases are being unpacked with the hope of bringing to light long forgotten treasures. Heavy gold-jointed bracelets are, for instance, turned into clasps for opera cloaks, and very handsome they look. Chestnut-colored, better still, are the old-fashioned lockets, or are being dangled at the end of gold chains, or are being inserted into match boxes to be worn on a chainele. The inside of the locket may be taken out, and a small bar of gold inserted to make it a better locket. Tops of earrings make buttons for nightdresses, and the longer drops make pretty safety pins for camisoles."

FILLS OF FASHION.

A novelty in wraps is a half coat of face, rounded up the back and trimmed with ruffles of chiffon.

Gold pencil guards, enameled and set with precious stones, are useful additions to the chainele.

A collar buckle of gold is in the shape of two maple leaves with small pearls set along the lines of the veins.

Scent bottles of cut glass, with tracings of silver, have covers of gold handsomely enameled and set with precious stones.

Pineapple bunting, a new pretty summer fabric, is made of cotton, and is made in little open meshes, but of the texture of gauze.

A handsome purse has a border of gold and is made of black velvet, and is being sold being sold. It is set with small precious stones.

A collar buckle of gold, in the shape of a fleur-de-lis, has the appearance of being made of a single piece of metal, and is relieved by bright cutting.

Lorgnette chains, with pearls set at intervals of from two to three inches, are being worn in demand. Others are mounted with emeralds and rubies.

Skirts of many of the thin gowns are tucked down several inches at the back, thereby giving a better fit effect and some fullness at the same time.

Waists belted at the back, with open jacket fronts, are quite a feature of tailor gowns of summer cloth, white or colored plique, buck, Holland and English drif.

The articles comprising a toilet set for a lady are mounted in gold, the back of each article having a miniature in very bright colors on an emerald green background.

Charming dancing dresses for debutantes are made with plain bodies almost covered with lace-trimmed fichus, the sleeves being nothing more than Louis XIV bow knots of wide velvet ribbon.

THOSE MISSING DOLLIES.

Strange Story of Covertousness, Repentance and Restitution.

The upper crust of Washington society is just now agitated by a little sensation, relates the Chicago Record. It is a trifling matter, but it has become a mystery and the good name of one of the prominent women in the diplomatic corps. Last winter several women who gave fine dinners and luncheons missed dollies. Some of them were of expensive embroidery, others of rich lace and, while they are little, useless ornaments, a set represents a good deal of money and to lose one of a set is to make the others practically useless, as everybody knows. It is common at state dinners to call in caterers who provide the table attendants and many a serious consultation took place between fashionable caterers and hospitable women over the disappearance of these dollies, which, of course, were charged to the servants. Finally the leading caterer of the capital called the attention of one of the cabinet ladies to a singular coincidence.

Dollies had been missed at every one of half a dozen dinners and luncheons he had served, where the wife of a certain minister had been a guest. None had ever disappeared when she was not present. It was a startling suggestion that would not do to repeat. The lady might be a kleptomaniac, but to accuse her of stealing would cause international complications for which nobody dared to assume the responsibility. The caterers whose waters had been accused held a conference. They decided among themselves that the woman referred to was guilty, but dared not accuse her even to exculpate themselves; so they devised a novel scheme and when they found her name on a dinner card they removed the valuable dolly from her plate at the table and carried it out of the room. They were affairs that you find in the restaurants. The ruse was successful. There was no more complaint.

Three or four months passed by. The incident was almost forgotten, when a matronly woman, evidently of Irish blood, who declined to give her name, called at the residence of the vice president, several members of the cabinet and diplomatic corps and at private houses where the upper crust are frequently entertained and inquired if the lady of the house had missed any of her dollies last winter; if so, would she kindly get the pattern. When a sample was brought the mysterious visitor retired into a corner with an apology and pretty soon handed back the sample with the missing piece of lace or embroidery. In this way nearly all of the missing dollies have been returned without further explanation, although the general understanding is that their recovery is due to the confessional of the Catholic church.

FOR HOUSEKEEPERS TO TRY.

Some Odds and Ends that Come in Handy This Time of Year.

To clean oil finished paint or hardwood use weak tea, almost cold, to remove the dust and discoloration, and then rub it over with a flannel cloth dipped in furniture polish made of one-third turpentine and one-third turpentine and one-third vinegar. Shake it well together in a bottle, pour it into a saucer and rub hard. It is a very satisfactory polish. One of the best hat trunks is without the cushion on the inside on which to pin the hats in traveling. A woman who has an affection for her hats dislikes to make any more pinholes in them than possible. Enough will be made in the course of ordinary wear.

The dense mass of jets, spangles and fancy sequins which have so long been popular on gowns of lace, net, satin, etc., are gradually giving place to a later and more comfortable fashion for black chastity and Venice point appliques over white mousseline de soie, tulle, chiffon or crepe lisse.

All sorts of pretty thin goods are made up into subunions, and they are more used this year than before. There was once a pretty maiden who traveled home from Europe with a subunion for a head covering. It was extremely becoming to her delicate prettiness, and she looked altogether so much like a doll that no one thought of criticizing her little whim in the way of a traveling bonnet.

Military designed for midsummer wear has lost much of its bold and erratic appearance, the greater portion of the latest models being made of white straw of some description, with delicate garnitures of soft draperies of white mousseline de soie, white lilacs or white violets, maidenhair fern fronds and fluffy, airy ostrich plumes or long slender white wings.

The golf and bicycle girls wear suits this year more on the style of those worn by the men than ever before. The man wears knickerbockers of a stylish plaid and a coat of some rough mixed goods, giving the effect of a solid color which matches the predominating color in the plaid. The girl wears similar plaid, a little quieter, perhaps, with a natty little tight-fitting jacket of the plain color in the mixed goods. Her shirt waists are somewhat more quiet than the man's shirts, and she is likely to wear with them a little string tie of the same material, while the man may wear a more elaborate scarf.
