about it, dealing and conning the greats cards with impassive stolidity. Bits of wilck served as substitutes for chips. There was real money at stake, and when an Indian sport went shy of legal tender he had a pony or two, and certain personal belongings to fall back on. A Plute Indian will gamble the shirt off his back.

The palefaces from the Golden Gate began to feel violently interested. They knew a few things, or thought they did, about the national game. Everybody ignored them. No one gave them even a fleeting glance.

The war of races was very stubbornis contested, but when the Pullman car porter came over to notify them that the track was cleared Messrs. Thall and Davis had accumulated about all the ready money in the tribe, to say nothing of various lethal weapons, buckskin shirts, war bonnets and specimens of beadwork. The porter could scracely stagger beneath their weight. "'You're on,' said Short, pulling out his wad instantly. "The freighter was puzzled to have his ager picked up so quickly, but he stood it, and both men put up their money with the La Junta agent of the express company. They arranged to start for Dodge City the next week. Short sent up to Denver for a $10 silk hat, and it reached him a couple of days later. Two days after that they took the train in company for Dodge, the freighter being still unaware of Short's identity as west, as well as the most dangerous man in a knife fight. As the train drew close to Dodge City the freighter said to Short: "'Podner, yo' had better take my advice and not git off with thet thing on yo' head. Yo' kin pull yo' bet down. I don't know nothin' about yo' fambly, or even if yo' got one, but ef the boys shoot yo' up, as they're boun' t' do, it'll sort o' stick by me, and I about it. "The eyes of every man in that crowd of nearly a hundred men were on Luke Short as he calmly stepped from the train, and not a man said a word. There was something in Short's serious countenance, in his determined carriage, and probably in the incongruity of the shiny silk hat in combination with the blue flannel shirt and the other strictly western effects in dress, that seemed to hold them off. It would have been quite in keeping with the customs and practices of Dodge City for the bunch of men at the station to shoot that silk hat into ribbons as Short deliberately walked down the main street, without once turning around, but this is just the thing that didn't happen. It didn't happen at any stage of the game, either; there wasn't even a single shot fired. Short walked into the Gilded Grub' saloon, still with that shiny hat set on one ear, strolled up to the bar and asked for a drink. There were a lot of bad men in the saloon, but they just looked, They didn't say anything about the hat, and they didn't shoot. Short took his drink and then he removed the hat and held it in
