HEROIC MEASURES. Grandfather's Pointed Lesson on the Obedience of Children. After standing it in rebellious silence for three days, relates the Detroit Free Press, the hale and rugged old gentleman called his daughter aside.

"See here, Ann," he began, "your children don't pretend to mind you." "I should say they didn't, father. They pay no more attention to me than if I were piece of statuary, unless I resort to extremes. But you should see their father bring them to time. He can do more in a word than I can in an hour's straight talk." "But that isn't right, Ann. They must be taught to respect and obey you while they are young. You are not with them enough; you fail to enter into their childish pleasures and to warm the natural affection that is a part of their being. Your own future happiness demands that you take the matter in hand. As between the everlasting social whirl and your children, they should have the preference."

"I don't know but your right, and I'm going to assert myself," but the old gentleman sighed at the tone in which the subject was dismissed.

Next day the mother was about to go out when one of the little folks grasped her about the dress and danced up and down in the rain because she could not go along. There was a cross reprimand, an angry shrick, and then the child, holding her arm ran to her grandpa. He chopped his visit off short and left for home that night. A little later the expressman left a pack age at the house and "Ann" was surprised
