SEES ONLY IN THE DARK.

Missouri Boy Whose Eyes Excel Those of the Owl. Physicians in Columbia, Mo., are much nterested in the case of Stanley Snacfer, 8 years old, who lives with his parents, Mr. and Mrs. E. C. Shaefer, in that city. The child is afflicted with a most remarkable optical deformity, relates a correspondent. He can see as well in total darkness as a person with natural sight can see in the light of day. He can walk into a dark room and find in a moment a pin or any other tiny object. Night is day for him, and day is night, for in the hours of daylight he is blind. His disposition and desires are largely influenced by his optical deformity. At night he is restless and full of life. In the daylime he is more inclined to sleep. His parents have some difficulty in restraining his desire to play and romp about during the hours of darkness. It is difficult for them to find safe amusement for him at midnight. All his little playmares are in bed, and the hoy can derive but small pleasure in his loneliness. But at times he evades his parents and takes a lonely midnight ramble. He has been heard romping about the neighborhood of his home in the middle of the darkest nights with only a dog for a companion.

Little Schaefer is a faithful student, and well advanced in his books. His teacher, however, is obliged to resort to unusual measures in instructing him. Of course, a dark room is the first essential in his reading lessons. The teacher draws down all the curtains in the room, closes the doors and ondeavors to make the room as dark as possible. Then Stanley rends.

During the daytime the child is often seen in the vicinity of his home, usually with a companion to guide him. At such times the eyes of the child are usually half closed. He gropes about like a blind person, and stumbles over the rough places unless guided by a faithful hand. When his friends great him he knows them only by their voices.

When he concludes to read awhile in the a 9:00 am lie can see as well in total darkness as a

When he concludes to read awhile in the daytime his proceedings are peculiar. After securing his book the boy goes to a closet and takes from a hook a most remarkable contrivance. It is almost as large as the child himself—long, black and in the shape of a funnel. Little Schaefer carries the strange device to the place desired, puts it down with the point unward, crawls under it and reads. The design and purpose of the unique contrivance is, of course, to exclude the light.

"What on earth is that funny-looking thing over there?" said a visitor to Mrs. Shaefer the other day, pointing to the desice as it said on the porch of the Shaefer Shaefer the other day, pointing to the device as it sat on the porch of the Shaefer residence.

"We have no particular name for it," said Mrs. Shaefer, with a smile "but I will show you what le under it."

She walked across the perch and quickly raised it from the floor. There sat little Shaefer learning his lessons.

The deformity of his sight is useful to him and to others in many ways. His ability to find things in the dark is very convenient for his family. His father, who is a butcher, often finds employment for the child in the cooling room of the butcher shap. Little Shaefer learning his lessons of the butcher shap. Little cooling room of the butcher shap. Little Shaefer goes into the cooling room, and after the door is closed to shut out all light, counts the pleces of meat in storage, and retorts the result to his father.

The light of the sum is especially annoying to the child, and he is rather inclined to be low-spirited and unhappy on bright, sunny days. On the contrary, cloudy weather seems to relieve him and he is much more atimated. The light of the sun is painful to him, the hinks and rubs his eyes and gives other evidence of distress when in the sunlight.

The child has been treated by many physias it sat on the porch of the Shaefer
