Mayor Kelly has decided to let the appointment of a chief of police rest for a short time. Miles Mitchell has refused to accept the position at the salary offered and he is now considered out of the race. W. S. Babcock, the former police judge, is being pushed by his friends for the job, but Mayor Kelly has given it out that the chief he appoints must be a man of experience, and this will cut Babcock out. The force as now composed is working nicely under Captain Allie and the method now in vogue in the handling of the department is considered a good one. Captain Allie has served notice on a number of suspicious characters to leave the city at once and he has told other suspects to keep quiet.
