An exceedingly interesting meeting of the Board of Education will be held tonight. The board will designate the old teachers who are to remain and is more than likely to choose a superintendent, an attorney and an architect.

There seems to be some speculation as to the election of a superintendent of public instruction. The friends of Dr. Wolfe are urging members of the board to vote for his re-election and it was asserted on the streets yesterday that enough votes had been pledged to Wolfe to elect him.

That day never came. When Rome's sun set it never to rise again. The vandals sacked the city and carried away with them the treasures to which the greatest artists of the world would produce had given the work of years. The paintings were overlooked, but the picture that Sienkiewicz had drawn is one that has never been excelled for historical accuracy and faithfulness of delineation.

The dramatist has wisely chosen to confine the stage version of the story as much as possible to the few principal actors, and these have been handled with fidelity to the original text and with dramatic skill. The action throughout the course of the six acts is in the nature of a crescendo movement and finally culminates in the tortures of the Christians in the arena at Rome. Even here the work is shown of unnecessary horrors. We are not obliged to look into that human shambles or to have our nerves racked by the clanking of chains, the creaking of the rack and blood-curdling groans. Instead, the Christians, from behind the walls of the arena, sing hymns of praise that He whom they have learned to worship and for whom they have given up their lives, is sustaining them in the hour when they most need His help.

The production is headed by Mr. George Farren in the role of Marcus Vinicius. It had been better for the production had some one else been substituted in his place. He is a well meaning and hard working actor, but he is not at all adequate to the part.
