WASHINGTON ON HORSEBACK

Colossal Statue of the First Amertean is Unveiled in Paris.

people of the United States was inaugurated with impressive and touching ceremonies today. It was the Washington colessal horseback figure by French and Potter. Tomorrow all the Franco-American social world and hundreds of visiting Americans will assemble again at another beautiful spot in the city to dedicate the Lafayettte monument by Bartlett, also an American culptor.

Washington's poble figure on horseback now stands unveiled, dominating from a tall marble pedestal, the Jena square and the wide avenues starting from there in five directions. The situation is admirable. Some idea may be gained of the appreciation shown our gift from the fact that the spot has been so far kept sacred, the ultimate intention being to erect the proposed memorial of the French people to their best beloved poet, Hugo, but upon the government's application the municipal council immediately yielded to Washington. Jena square is in the heart of the fashionable quarter, where dwell countless Americans.

Opposite the statue a stand accommodat ing 1,500 people was erected, beautifully decorated with the joint flags of France and America, upholstered in red, with yellow hangings heavily fringed with gold besides. On a platform opposite was Sousa's band, which had to make the quickest trip on record in order to be present. All the neighboring houses were decorated with flags and bunting, garlands of foliage and flowers in the windows and roofs and the sidewalk were black with enthusiastic beholders while crowding the stands was one of the most brilliant assemblies ever seen here at

The ceremonies be gan at 10:50, exactly twenty minutes late Sousa rendering the "Star Spangled Banner and the "Marseillaise." Then Ambassado Porter delivered a lofty vibrant discourse partly in French and partly in English. This speech, full of happy, terse sayings, frequently elicited thunderous applause When the ambassador called Washington th immortal champion of the sacred rights of self government there were a few cries of "Vive les Boers.." Consul Gowdy followed. His address was delivered in tones ringing with patriolic emotion. He was also often interrupted with applause and hurrahs. The unveiling was then made by Mesdames Jones and Mauning, while Sousa played "Hail to the Chief." The scene when the canvas was hauled down and the proud statue appeared, glittering in its newness, was extremely moving. The people in the stands, despite their enthusiasm, preserved their composure, but the French massed outside policemen were instructed to arrest any the water line, below which the brick made the lanes of American exposition guards and Paris mounted police yelled bravos. "Vive l'Amerique," "Vive les deux re publiques," "Vive Washington," waving hats and throwing them in the air. Ambassador Porter introduced Minister Delcasse, who formally and in very happy fraternal terms accepted the gift in the name of the French nation. During the discourse the minister of foreign affairs was frequently interrupted by one wildeyed nationalist standing among the press representatives, immediately under the speakers' stand. This fool began vigorously shouting "Vive l'armee" as soon as Delcasse alluded to Washington's military operations and then kept up a running flow of offensive remarks, sometimes in an undertone, sometimes very loud. The minister was manifestly annoyed and everybody embarrassed, till, upon the suggestion of several American correspondents, the uniformed athlete who captains the United States guards placed a hand on the sh ulder of the indivadual, asking him whether he cared to experience what an American bouncing was. When the offer was trans lated the obstreperous patriot immediately subsided.

Colonel Chaille in a long speech briefly retraced Washington's historical career. At last a march by Sousa concluded the ceremonies and after General Porter had called for and obtained three rousing cheers for the sister republics the first raindrops drove the
